Olmert to step aside

Olmert announced that he would not run in his party's upcoming primaries. "I will not run for the primaries of Kadima. I will not interfere in internal elections," Olmert said. "I will gladly welcome the result. When a new party leader is elected, I will resign as prime minister to allow the new head to set up a new government quickly." Olmert said his highest priority until he resigns would be to achieve peace. "Beyond all this, I continue to believe with all my heart that achieving peace, stopping terrorism, strengthening security and creating different relations with our neighbours are the most vital goals for the future of the State of Israel," Olmert said "We are closer than ever to concrete understandings that are likely to be the basis for agreements in the two strands of dialogue, the Palestinian and the Syrian." Olmert is the subject of several corruption investigations and has been under pressure from his colleagues to resign. He called the allegations a "witch hunt" and said his enemies are using the justice system to undermine the democratic process.

Some Jewish Gazans resettled well

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SHOMRIYA, Israel — The majority of the nearly 9,000 Jewish settlers in the Gaza Strip who were evicted from their homes prior to Israel's unilateral withdrawal in the summer of 2005 are still dazed and bitter as they struggle to regain their footing.

At Nitzan, a makeshift camp north of Ashkelon where almost 500 families from Gaza were temporarily housed after Israel's pullout, Yossi Dafna – a local grocer who once prospered as an exporter of winter vegetables to Europe – expressed anger.

"The government promised to give us land and hasn't," he said, complaining that bureaucratic delays have placed him and his friends in painful limbo.

Politics and environmentalism are at the heart of Dafna's plight.

Shortly after the then-prime minister Ariel Sharon announced his intention to withdraw from Gaza, the Israeli media reported that some of the evacuees would be resettled amid the pristine sand dunes adjacent to Kibbutz Nitzanim.

Three years after the pullout

Please see editorial page 8

Environmentalists nipped that plan in the bud, arguing that Israel had a responsibility to save that fragile ecosystem. As a result of their intense lobbying, the Nitzanim Sand Dune Park, the largest such reserve in Israel, was created. Hundreds of Jews from a cluster of settlements in Gush Katif in Gaza were thus resettled in Nitzan, a short distance from Kibbutz Nitzanim, which was conquered by the Egyptian army during the 1948 War of Independence and then recaptured by Israeli forces.

On the third anniversary of Israel's pullout from Gaza, they still languish in Nitzan as the Israeli government grapples with their fate.

Dafna, who lived in Gaza for 25 years, does not think that immediate relief is in sight.

Israel Deports Cdn.

KINGSTON, Ont. — A Canadian student from Kingston, Ont., who was deported from Israel after taking part in a protest against the West Bank separation barrier returned home last week. Victor MacDiarmid, 23, a University of Toronto student who had spent a month in the West Bank volunteering with the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement, was arrested July 23 for taking pictures of a protest in Nilin. He returned to Canada July 30. He says he was beaten by Israeli soldiers after his arrest. A Canadian consular official who visited him in detention in Tel Aviv said he was in good health, CBC reported.

Hate Graffiti Found

WINNIPEG — Eight swastikas and the message "Kill the Jews" were scrawled on a billboard for the Canadian Museum for Human Rights last week at the site where the facility is slated be built. Winnipeg police are investigating the incident as a hate crime and said the graffiti, in black ink, will be erased once the investigation is finished. Gail Asper, who is spearheading the effort to build the museum, told the Winnipeg Free Press that the graffiti shows why it's needed. The $265-million museum is still raising money for the project, and construction won't begin until it meets its $105-million goal. It has raised 90 per cent of that total so far.

World

Bishops Hear Rabbi

LONDON — The collapse of religion leads to a breakdown of social structure, Britain's chief rabbi told 670 Anglican bishops. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, speaking to the bishops of the worldwide Anglican Communion meeting, appealed to Christians, Jews and people of other faiths to work together. He said the decline of religious belief has led to the spread of depression, stress, eating disorders, and drug and alcohol abuse. He's the first Orthodox Jewish leader to speak to the Anglican conference in Canterbury in southern England, which takes place once in a decade.

New Ethical Hechsher

NEW YORK — Guidelines for the Conservative movement's ethical kashrut initiative were released last week. Hekhsher Tzedek aims to certify foods produced by firms that adhere to standards of worker safety and environmental sensitivity, among other criteria. The certification would complement a traditional hechsher. The idea gained prominence after the May 12 immigration raid at Agriprocessors, the largest kosher meat producer in the United States, which critics say mistreats its workers. The firm has denied wrongdoing.

Olympian Released

ADDIS ABABA — Israel's entrant for the Olympic marathon was released from an Ethiopian prison four days after his arrest. Ayele Seteng, who immigrated to Israel from Ethiopia, returned to the African state for the final stretch of high-altitude training, only to be arrested in a long-running debt dispute. A judge ordered his release from a Gondar jail July 24 amid concerns he might miss the Olympics. Seteng, 53, plans to remain in Ethiopia to train for the Aug. 24 marathon. He finished 20th in the 2004 Olympics race in Athens.

Venerable Bazaar To End After 84 Years

TORONTO — A Toronto tradition will end this fall after 84 years because of competition from discount retailers.

Hadassah-WIZO's CHW Toronto Centre chapter, which runs the annual Hadassah-WIZO Bazaar, has announced that the Oct. 29 event at Exhibition Place – famed for bargains on new and used clothes, housewares, games, toys, books and food – will be the last.

Bazaar chair Barbie Benjamin-Levitt told CityNews.ca that competition from outlet and box stores led Hadassah-WIZO to find new ways to fundraise.

"Society's changing… and we're trying to change with it," bazaar chair Barbie Benjamin-Levitt said.

"We're going to go out on top, and we're going to come out with something new to keep the community going and to keep our volunteers going… it's time for a change."

The bazaar raises money for health programs in Toronto and Israel, including Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem, a breast cancer clinic at Assaf Harofeh Medical Center near Tel Aviv and a new neo-natal intensive care unit at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre.

New project tries to care for the caregivers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time, seven Jewish community agencies are joining forces to help people who are caring for aging or ailing family members.

The agencies – Circle of Care, Baycrest, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, Chai Tikvah Foundation, Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto and Reena – will collaborate to deliver support services through the newly established Family Caregiver Connections Project.

Its goals include co-ordinating existing support programs at partnering agencies, enhancing existing support services, extending outreach and services to previously unidentified family caregivers, and creating new initiatives.

The project is being funded by the province through the Central Local Health Integration Network, as part of the Ontario government's Aging at Home Strategy.

Devora Schwartz-Waxman, Family Caregiver Connections co-ordinator, said that funding and support for the project reflects the government's and the Jewish community's commitment to supporting seniors, for whom diverting and delaying admission to long-term care facilities is possible if appropriate community support services are available.

Schwartz-Waxman said caregivers are often not identified as being caregivers, but in 2005 there were 4.5 million Canadians providing unpaid care for family members.

"Very often, our focus falls on the family member who needs care, but caregivers have lots of needs as well. Their lives change dramatically when they become caregivers. They are an underrepresented population in need of help."

The Jewish community is starting to become aware of the large number of such people, she said, because as the population ages, there are more and more them.

Schwartz-Waxman, said the project will offer help to caregivers in such areas as taking time out for themselves without feeling guilty, financial planning, and managing power of attorney issues, as well as assistance for aging caregivers of adult children needing care.

"Making arrangements for [the children] is crucial," she said.

Rochelle Goldman-Brown, executive director of Chai Tikvah Foundation, which provides support services for psychiatrically disabled adults, said that seniors who have adult children with mental health problems need to make sure their children will have an income for the rest of their lives and that they will be eligible for financial assistance.

"They need to plan for the future of their child before it is too late to access services."

Devora Schwartz-Waxman

Immigrant families have particular needs with regard to caregiving, said Romm Gurel, community integration and outreach worker at JIAS Toronto, because seniors are dependent on their families for years before they are eligible for government assistance.

"This reality puts a great burden on the caring families who are left with no choice but to have their aging parents live with them without many of the services offered to Canadian senior citizens," Gurel said.

Immediate plans for the project include establishing a telephone line to link caregivers to existing community resources; providing transportation and respite care to let caregivers utilize services outside their homes, and holding educational workshops for caregivers.

Linda Jackson, director of community and ambulatory services at Baycrest, said it's important to reach out to people who don't think of themselves as caregivers.

"A wife or husband taking care of their spouse at home may not see themselves as a caregiver. They might not realize they could benefit from these services," Jackson said.

Never a dull moment

From the editor's desk

The observation that Israeli public life offers never a dull moment is akin to observing that Canadian winters can sometimes be rough. It is rather stating the obvious.

That lack of dullness was on vivid display last week in Jerusalem.

On Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert did what most people had been clamouring for more than two years for him to do: he effectively stepped down from the premiership of the Jewish state. But the stepping down is prospective. It takes effect after his Kadima party will choose a new leader, which may or may not come as soon as mid-September. (Please see the related stories on page 9.)

Felled finally by the cumulative weight of numerous investigations into allegations of impropriety, he posed the question that was on the minds of a large majority of Israelis.

"The time has come for me to take a decision," Olmert said in a dramatic, sombre, even tearful public address from the prime ministerial official residence. "What's more important... my own personal justice or the public good?"

It is that very same question, or more precisely, its answer, that is the indispensible anchor of every democracy everywhere on earth. It provides stability and balance to the very structure of democratic government when the inevitable ill winds of public disaffection topple governments and the careers of individual politicians.

Olmert is now the proverbial lame duck. He may propose initiatives, but who will be willing to dispose of them with him? There is now no meeting point between the legal and moral authorities of the office of prime minister.

The list of contenders to replace Olmert as party leader is already known.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni is perhaps the highest profile candidate on the list.

But Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz will likely challenge her, as will Internal Minister Avi Dichter, both of whom can claim strong security credentials.

The campaigning within Kadima party ranks has already begun.

And of course, all campaigning for the privilege of leading a political party necessarily shifts the focus from the collective to the individual. That is as true for leadership campaigns in Canada as it is in Israel.

Thus, the question that Olmert demonstrably posed and answered on television last week is the very same one that can be posed to those vying to succeed him: "What's more important... personal or public good?"

Over the next six weeks, it will be interesting to observe the behaviours and promises of the candidates for the leadership of the Kadima party.

It will also be interesting to observe Olmert's behaviour as he presses forward with policies and initiatives that his successor may or may not endorse.

Thank God for Rabbi Shmuele Rabinowitz, rabbi of the Western Wall and holy sites in Israel.

He responded swiftly, firmly and with great dignity to the unconscionable indignity that was visited upon Senator Barack Obama last week.

Like most visitors to the Western Wall, Obama placed a note into the holy interstices between the ancient stones. Quickly thereafter, the note was removed by an insensitive cad and then passed on to the media in Israel. Its contents – and I would add, surprisingly and alas – were made public.

If the Western Wall is not a sanctuary for an individual's most secret, inner hopes and thoughts, what place on earth can be?

Once the theft of Obama's note became known, Rabbi Rabinowitz immediately condemned the act.

"Notes which are placed in the Western Wall are between the person and his Maker; Heaven forbid that one should read them or use them in any way. The custom of placing notes between the stones of the Western Wall is ancient and is used as a means of expression by a person praying to his Creator.

"This sacrilegious action deserves sharp condemnation and represents a desecration of the holy site."

The young man who stole the note subsequently apologized. I am not aware if the media outlet that published the contents of the note did as well. Obama's note has been restored to a new place along the metaphysical pathways to God in and among the craggy stones of the Wall. The notes in the Wall are not intended for human eyes.

By his quick, assertive response, Rabbi Rabinowitz repaired what was clearly a chilul HaShem, a desecration of God's name.

Never a dull moment.

– MBD

RIOTS OF 1929

In August 1929, extremist Arab national sentiment against Jews was fomented by Hajj Amin El Husseini, who spread false rumours that Jews were attempting to build a synagogue at the Western Wall. As a result of the incitement, rioting and violence were directed against the Jewish communities in Hebron, Jerusalem, Safed, Haifa, Motza and elsewhere. Thousands of Jews fled the ancient Jewish quarter in Jerusalem. Some 67 Jews were massacred in Hebron. The Jewish community then evacuated Hebron. Pictured are a home destroyed by the Arab rioters and a man grieving over the loss of a loved one.

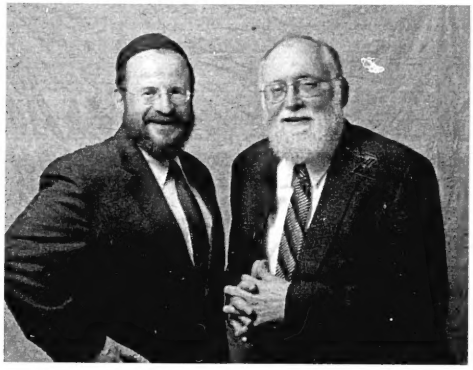
Jews for Judaism counters growing missionary movement

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In sports, there's a cliche that successful coaches often repeat before a big game. Asked how they plan to defend against a tough opponent, they say, "We're not worried about what the opposition will do. We're worried about what we will do."

Though Rabbi Michael Skobac and Julius Ciss might not necessarily employ a sports metaphor, as the guiding hands behind Jews for Judaism, they, too, recognize that Jews must first tend to their own people before worrying about Christian missionaries.

After years of going toe to toe with evangelizing Christians, they recognize that the best way to block their inroads into the Jewish community is by building better Jews. Or to put it another way, they believe that Jews who see the spiritual and religious dimension of their own faith will be less likely to be tempted by other religions.



Rabbi Michael Skobac and Julius Ciss

To that end, Jews for Judaism offers annual lecture series and individual seminars to educate Jews about the beauty of Judaism.

Next up in Toronto are three free public lectures. On Aug. 6, Rabbi Skobac, Jews for Judaism's director of education, will speak on "Catching the spirit of Jewish spirituality." He will follow that up on Aug. 12 with a discussion titled, "Sharing the light: how to communicate the beauty of Judaism."

Finally, on Aug. 21, Ciss, the organization's executive director, will share his "Reflections of a Former Jew for Jesus." Ciss was a member of that organization for more than five years. All lectures will take place at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., Room 421, and start at 8:00 p.m.

Over the past 18 years, Jews for Judaism has offered three or four lecture series per year, attracting a couple of dozen people at a time. The Internet offers the opportunity to expand that reach by orders of magnitude.

The organization operates several webites, and so far this year, the sites (www.jewsforjudaism.org; www.be-true.org) have garnered 17,000 visits per month, up from 12,200 last year.

Most recently, with the assistance of twentysomethings adept in computer technology, Jews for Judaism has publicized itself through online social networking sites. A recent lecture in Montreal attracted 150 participants strictly through publicity generated on Facebook, Rabbi Skobac said.

The marriage of an ancient spiritual faith and modern technology is one way that Jews for Judaism is trying to stem growing missionary efforts to entice Jews to Christianity.

Making the case that all their spiritual needs can be found within Judaism is the best way to prevent missionaries from succeeding, Rabbi Skobac said. "The bread and butter of our work is education. Forewarned is forearmed."

The other aspect of the educational endeavour is preparing Jews – many of whom are woefully ignorant of their own heritage – to understand "the claims made by these people." The missionary movement argues that accepting Christianity is consistent with Judaism. Jews for Judaism refutes that by showing that Jews do not accept Jesus as the messiah, let alone as a divine being, Ciss said.

After years of interviewing people who have accepted the missionary message, Rabbi Skobac believes that "Judaism was not presented to them as focused on having a relationship with God."

The result is an apparent susceptibility to the enticements of other faiths. Citing a 2006 UJA Federation of Greater Toronto study, Rabbi Skobac said 5.8 per cent of Toronto Jews, or approximately 11,000 people, say they identify as Jews by ethnicity, but practise another religion. A further 8.1 per cent (14,585) identify as Jews ethnically but practise no religion.

Jews for Judaism estimates that more than 250,000 Jews have converted over the past decades. Missionary efforts have even reached into Israel, where as many as 15,000 Jews have left the faith.

Ciss said the Christian missionary movement has been increasing its efforts to proselytize Jews in recent years. More than 100 groups have been targeting Canadian Jews, and they are well-funded. Among them are Jews for Jesus, Chosen People Ministries and the City of David Messianic Synagogue, which recently opened a large, high-profile facility at Yonge and Clark streets in Thornhill.

Many of those attracted to other religions grew up in a nominally Jewish home, Rabbi Skobac continued. They may have attended weekend Hebrew school, had bar or bat mitvahs, and celebrated holidays.

"But they didn't really experience it in a spiritual way or they did not establish a relationship with God," he said.

"Our failure... is the reason for their success," Ciss said.

Ciss, who attended weekend Jewish school many years ago, said the experience turned many people away from Judaism. The bar mitzvah was "seen by young people as a ticket to be released from learning about Judaism... My peers are raising kids today who are open prey for spiritual predators."

He added: "Getting a day school education is almost a recipe for Jewish continuity... People who come to us for counselling, it's almost across the board that they lack this education."

"The real answer is to have a Jewish community that is vibrantly Jewish, expressing spirituality through the Jewish faith," Ciss added.

UJA Federation looks to the future

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recently held a leadership retreat at Jeff and Lori Rosenthal's cottage in Innisfil, Ont.

The Toronto Jewish community provides leadership for the entire Jewish world, said Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at the organization's annual leadership retreat recently.

"We want to be the best," Sokolsky told more than 100 employees and volunteers. "We're setting the bar up there for other Jewish communities."

The retreat, held at Jeff and Lori Rosenthal's cottage in Innisfil, Ont., introduced UJA Federation's 2009 campaign, which will focus on certain specific areas.

In the first of these, "our goal is to help engage young Jews in Toronto," said Rachel Lerner, director of strategic community planning initiatives. "Jews should know we have amazing young Jews in the community… and it's our job to support them."

One way of targeting the younger population is through the federation's incubator program, which provides funding and mentorship to social entrepreneurs aged 25 to 35, who are trying to find innovative solutions to social problems.

Jonathan Moneta, a recent graduate of York University, used the incubator program to work with Limmud Toronto, an organization that helps promote Jewish education through an annual festival, discussion groups and conferences.

"The social incubator program supports me financially and professionally," Moneta, co-ordinator of the one-day Taste of Limmud festival, said at the retreat.

Until two years ago, Moneta was not involved in the Jewish community. Then he spent his senior year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"I discovered my Jewish identity," he said.

Moneta hopes to turn the Limmud festival into an immersive experience that lasts for several days.

Still with the focus on youth, the federation's 2009 campaign plans to provide new resources to help enrich Jewish campus life in Ontario and expand new programs, including the Jewish camp incentive program, which helps connect campers with their Jewish roots. The federation hopes to bring in 1,000 first-time Jewish overnight campers by 2011.

Another major aim of the new campaign is to expand the organization's work with struggling Jewish families. The provincial government recently cut some $1 million of funding from Jewish Family and Child.

"We're working with poor families, we work with seniors," said Adam Minsky, chief of community capacity building at UJA. "[We need] to make sure clients don't bear the brunt of cutbacks."

The federation also plans to increase its aid to programs that serve Jewish seniors and the working poor. Among the agencies the UJA works with are the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto (JIAS).

At the retreat, guests also learned about UJA Federation's involvement with Israel. With UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), it runs programs and provides financial aid throughout Israel.

"The UJA is involved in the peripheries," said UIAFC director general Yossi Tanuri, pointing to the UIAFC's role in Israel's educational system. "[Without education] Israel has no future," he said.

One group the federation funds is the Youth Futures program in Eilat that works with welfare offices, parole offices and schools to help at-risk youth.

Eilat Pilo is a mentor for young people participating in Youth Futures, which shadows the Israeli youngsters to ensure that they succeed every step of the way, from getting to school to having a safe place to socialize.

"Most of these children used to fail all the time – this is all they know. We give them a good vision," Pilo said. "[The kids] have group activities once a week. We talk about violence, drugs, drinking. My job is to take them and show them the right way."

UJA Federation also supports after-school study centres for new immigrant youth in Israel and continues to provide financial aid for relief and rescue programs worldwide.

The UJA is not about "being the best for the sake of being on top," Sokolsky said. "We strive to make the Jewish community a model for a community that cares for itself."

Seven agencies work together

"They don't recognize themselves as needy, because they don't think that they're the ones with needs. It could be an enlightening moment for them to realize that they, too, could use some help. It is fascinating that they have not thought about calling for help for themselves."

She said research indicates that caregivers often make themselves ill with the physical and emotional stress of taking care of their loved ones. "Our focus will be on outreach and prevention, and the project will allow caregivers respite to access programs for themselves."

She said that representatives of the agencies have met, and staff members are excited to work together in order to maximize their strengths.

Lorraine Blass, vice-president of Circle of Care, said it's "highly innovative and unusual" for seven Jewish agencies to work together. "This impressed the funding body tremendously, because each of us has something else to offer."

History still to judge

The scenes are seared into our memory. Rage, anger, violence, tenderness, tears, compassion, sadness, confusion, incongruity, conviction, determination and great strength of character. All these words and more are part of the remarkable portrait of one of the most compelling moments in Israel's young history.

Three years ago this week, the Jewish state unilaterally withdrew all Jews from the Gaza Strip. There were a number of justifications for the initiative. Chief among them was the belief that it was inappropriate, on many levels, for the Jewish state to rule over the more than one million Arabs who live in Gaza. That the pullout was undertaken unilaterally, without any quid from the Palestinian Authority for Israel's significant quo, was one of the main criticisms of the withdrawal even among supporters of the idea.

Israel and Israelis paid and continue to pay a steep price in humanitarian, financial and strategic terms for disengagement from the Palestinians of Gaza. As CJN reporter Sheldon Kirshner writes in a feature story this issue, "the majority [of the former residents of Gush Katif] are still dazed and bitter."

The government of Israel recently reported that "some 72 per cent of the families evacuated from the Gaza Strip and northern Samaria" have taken up the re-settlement recovery options offered to them. The Disengagement Authority reported that "approximately NIS 8 billion [about $2.35 billion] has been invested in the disengagement process and in the rehabilitation of evacuees thus far… NIS 3 million [$883,000] has been invested in compensation and temporary and permanent residences for each family."

The Authority further reported that "the average Gush Katif farmer has received, directly or indirectly, compensation up to NIS 5 million [$1.5 million] for his plot of land."

The government has not been ungenerous with the families and the individuals whose pullout-related miseries it caused. Of course, the damage wrought by those miseries cannot only be measured by material or financial loss. Some of that damage has cut far deeper and may last far longer than the time it takes to rebuild a home.

Strategically, Israel's security seems lessened. The removal of the Israel Defence Forces and the subsequent putsch by Hamas have led to the creation of an Islamist, Iranian-backed, terrorist, mini-state along Israel's southern border. Thousands of Qassam and other rockets have fallen on Israel since the unilateral withdrawal.

And yet, as many Israelis have also observed, the withdrawal has put paid to the notion that this leadership and this generation of Palestinians are interested in building an independent Palestinian state to live alongside an independent Jewish one. Hamas and its sponsors show themselves time and again to be more interested in destroying the Jewish state than in building a Palestinian one. Palestinian behaviour in Gaza has been the yardstick by which most Israelis will measure any concessions in the West Bank.

Thus, it falls still to history to judge whether the withdrawal by Israel from Gaza in the August heat of 2005 was the right thing to do.

Israel gets 'amber' light to attack Iran

Israel has the "amber" light from the United States to launch a strike on Iran, according to a source in the Pentagon. In a recent report, it was stated that President George W. Bush has given Israel conditional approval for an attack. The unconfirmed report acknowledged that the approval came despite of opposition among top brass in the U.S. armed forces and American worries over the political and economic consequences that such an attack would carry. This means get on with your preparations, stand by for immediate attack and tell us when you're ready, but you (Israel) will not be able to count on U.S. military support for the strike.

The official said that the Israeli Air Force would not be permitted to refuel at American air bases in Iraq. The official also said the Bush administration would not attack Iran. It looks as if the United States expects Israel to take on the Iranian threat single-handedly, despite the global nature of the threat.

The world is afraid of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and all are afraid to act. Is that due to Iran's oil reserves or Iran's missiles? Will the fate of the West once again rely on tiny Israel's intelligence and its air force to destroy a nuclear menace?

Jerusalem and peace talks

In "Renewed peace talks must start with Jerusalem," (CJN Perspectives, July 17), Yitzhak Reiter makes no mention of the terrible tragedy in human terms that is a consequence of the Oslo accords. He treats the problem of achieving peace academically and selectively. The "sense of euphoria" that accompanied the signing of the Oslo accords was not shared by even one military or security expert. Even Shimon Peres, one of the main architects of Oslo, acknowledged then that human "sacrifices for peace" were inevitable. If smaller concessions have encouraged the Palestinians to wage a destructive war of terror against the Jewish state, how much more so would the major concessions that Reiter speaks of?

Reiter's suggestions would evoke a "sense of euphoria" among our enemies in their certainty that total victory is within reach, terror is effective and justifiable, and the Jewish state is in its death throes.

Israel, Hezbollah prisoner swap

I strongly disagree with Yoni Goldstein's column about the recent Israel and Hezbollah prisoner swap ("Upholding the contract," CJN, July 31). I have the utmost sympathy for the families of the two dead soldiers, but to liberate a cold-blooded murderer was a big mistake. Now that the terrorists have learned that only dead bodies have to be returned, they will do just that. What about the feelings of the family whose members were murdered? What pain did they feel after learning that the killer would walk free and celebrate. This deal was a very wrong political and strategic decision by Israel's government.

Human rights commissions

I am aware of the controversy currently brewing regarding human rights commissions and their role in today's society, and it is apparent to me that the noble ideas that led to the founding of these commissions have been usurped by cynical individuals with social agendas ("The limits of freedom of speech," CJN, July 17). At this point, human rights commissions are harming our society far more than they are helping. They are also not needed now in the way that they might have been 40 years ago. I do not believe the human rights commissions system can be saved, because the potential for its abuse seems to be infinite, and more examples of this abuse pop up every day. The human rights commissions system needs to be dismantled. Canadian Jewish Congress leaders are on the wrong side in this battle.

Olmert's resignation plunges Israel into uncertainty

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

Ehud Olmert's announcement that he will not seek re-election plunged Israel into deep political uncertainty at a time when the country faces several crucial diplomatic tests.

Confronted with police investigations into possible illegal fundraising activities and a climate of intense political hostility – including from leading members of his own Kadima party – the Israeli prime minister held a hastily assembled news conference last Wednesday evening to announce he will resign.

The change will become effective once Kadima chooses a new leader in primary elections scheduled for mid-September. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz are the leading contenders.

"Things got out of all reasonable proportion," Olmert said in his speech, referring to what he called "ceaseless attacks" against him. "The prime minister is not above the law, but he is not by any means under it."

Maintaining his innocence, Olmert said he would step aside for the public good.

"The time has come for me to take a decision," Olmert said. "What's more important – my own personal justice or the public good?"

In the short term, Olmert's announcement means he will stay in office as a lame duck until Kadima elects a new leader – either Sept. 17, when the primary is held, or Sept. 24, when a runoff, if necessary, takes place.

Kadima's new leader will become the acting prime minister and be charged with assembling a coalition government. The failure to muster a majority of at least 61 Knesset members in the coalition would trigger new general elections.

Aside from casting a cloud of uncertainty over political succession, the development raised questions about how Israel's major diplomatic initiatives will fare during this period of political transition – including peace tracks with the Palestinians and Syria, and the effort to halt Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

At the time of the announcement, Livni was meeting in Washington with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to discuss those issues. Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who leads the Labor party, was on a plane heading home from meetings in Washington.

Israeli pundits speculated that the absence of Livni and Barak – two of Olmert's main political adversaries – from the country was a factor in the timing of the prime minister's announcement.

Barak could trigger new general elections by pulling Labor out of the governing coalition, but he trails Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu in polls showing that Netanyahu would win handily if a general election were held today.

By leaving the political stage this way, Olmert ensures that his Kadima successor can run for the next general election in 2010 as the incumbent prime minister, possibly providing a boost to that candidate.

Olmert said Wednesday that he would not meddle in the Kadima primary and that he wanted to engender a respectful and fair political transition.

The prime minister has been under a cloud of investigations almost since his first day in office. Olmert assumed the post in January 2006 when a coma disabled Ariel Sharon, and won an election two months later to retain the premiership.

But the latest scandal, in which American Jewish businessman Morris Talansky testified that he gave Olmert $150,000 in cash over the course of the decade and a half before Olmert became prime minister, crippled Olmert's ability to govern.

Even Olmert's decision to re-launch Turkish-mediated peace talks with Syria and sign a cease-fire deal with Hamas in Gaza were viewed with suspicion by some who derided the moves as ploys to ensure his political survival.

Since the Talansky scandal broke, a growing chorus of Israeli pundits, Knesset members and intellectuals had called on Olmert to step aside, if only to allow the government to focus on the urgent threat of a nuclear Iran.

It is not immediately clear how Olmert's resignation will affect Israel's campaign to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons.

He failed in peace and in war

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

With eyes glittering with tears and a soft voice, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert appeared last week before the few reporters who attended the event that marked his leaving office. Behind him, on the piano at the prime minister's residence, stood a large vase of white flowers, hiding the large painting of cypress trees painted by his wife, Aliza. In the near future, the couple will look for a new home for that painting, and the aides who listened in silence to the announcement that their boss was stepping down will begin new careers.

Olmert's short tenure has left many of them wishing for more – a sense that they missed out on something big.

"We were nearly there," one of the aides said. "On Passover last year, we emerged from the Winograd Committee, and with the Lebanon War behind us and politics being stable, it was possible to move ahead on the peace process. And then came the Talansky affair, and everything crashed on top of us. Too bad. Olmert could have done great things."

Olmert came into office in a storm with the collapse of Ariel Sharon, and is departing in a storm of police investigations. During his 31 months as prime minister, he failed to meet the main mission he had set for himself: a new border with the Palestinians on the West Bank that would ensure the future of Israel as a Jewish state. The task is now being left to his successors.

Olmert excelled as a political manager and as leader of a coalition, but he did not manage to gain public affection. His victory in the March 2006 elections was not decisive, a situation that prevented him from transforming Kadima into the dominant ruling party. Only his exceptional skill in running political systems enabled him to enjoy relative stability in his post, until the collapse of recent weeks.

He was better than his predecessors in giving attention and support to politicians, and he appreciated the fact that their wish to keep their jobs and avoid early elections was more powerful than the public criticism directed against him. Olmert established a particularly good relationship with world leaders, and this year, he managed to host the leaders of the United States (twice), France, Britain and Germany.

Olmert's tenure was diverted from its path on June 25, 2006, the day Gilad Schalit was abducted to the Gaza Strip, and crashed completely 2-1/2 weeks later, with the abduction of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev by Hezbollah. The abductions transformed him from being Sharon's successor, who intended to continue the process of disengagement, into the leader of a nation at war.

Olmert failed this test three times: in the appointment of Amir Peretz as defence minister, in his rushed decision to embark on the Second Lebanon War, and in his decision to continue the war that had lost its point after the first strike of fire.

The helplessness of the government during the war, the serious shortcomings in the conduct of the army, wore down Olmert's meagre popularity. The public was tired of him, and did not want his leadership, even when he tried to lead the country in a different direction.

The irony is that MKs Tzipi Livni and Shaul Mofaz, who are contending to be his successor, offered him ways out during the war. Livni suggested avoiding an escalation and bringing the offensive to an end a few days after it had started; Mofaz suggested an operation that might have saved Israel the frontal assault and avoided the many casualties in the final week of the war.

The public's disappointment as a result of the war only became deeper as the corruption allegations became an avalanche.

Be deliberate in judgment

The first Mishnah in Pirkei Avot tells us to "be deliberate in judgment." Presumably, this Mishnah is advising judges, reminding them to deliberate carefully before rendering a decision.

But the genius of this Mishnah goes well beyond the jurist and provides excellent advice for everyone: don't rush to judgment.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

All of us must make multiple judgments every day. When we meet someone, when we buy something, when we make plans, we're constantly judging the world around us.

The Mishnah is reminding all of us to judge carefully and methodically. Snap judgments are often corrupted by preconceived notions and emotional responses.

Many people make foolish snap judgments.

Take, for example, one executive director at a large charity I know. An older man in a rumpled suit and gruff manner showed up at his office one day, asking to join his board. The executive director dismissed him immediately, assuming that a lack of fashion sense and social graces meant he had little to offer. Unfortunately, he soon found out that he had turned away someone who was about to become a major philanthropist. Like all snap judgments, judging a book by its cover is knee-jerk stupidity.

Richard Jewell can tell you about preconceived notions. During the 1996 Summer Olympics, Jewell alerted the Atlanta police about a suspicious package that turned out to be a bomb. Because some elements in Jewell's life resembled a hypothetical profile of the bomber, the FBI assumed Jewell was guilty. Only three months later did the FBI realize they had besmirched the reputation of the one true hero of that July evening.

Jesse Ramirez can tell you about emotional decisions made in haste. As the Arizona Republic reported last year, he "suffered major brain injuries in a car accident on May 30. Doctors said the injuries could have left him blind or in a permanent vegetative state. On June 8, his wife, Rebecca, asked doctors to remove his food and water tubes… Now [June 28], he can hug and kiss, nod his head, answer yes and no questions, give a thumbs-up sign and sit in a chair."

Luckily, Jesse didn't die because his family stopped his wife from removing life support. But hasty hospital decisions affect a lot of people. People are overwhelmed by emotion, frightened that they will have to watch a loved one linger in a permanent vegetative state, and they make foolish and hasty decisions about a relative's life. Tragically, snap decisions in an ICU have life-and-death consequences.

The Mishnah is advising judges to be thorough in rendering a verdict. But its advice goes beyond judges. It reminds the rest of us never to rush to judgment.

Jewish peoplehood is alive and kicking

Is Jewish peoplehood still an alluring concept for modern students? But even as federations have embraced "peoplehood" as the new buzzword to replace "continuity," many experts insist that younger Jews don't define themselves as being responsible to the collective entity of the Jewish people anymore.

Demographers tell us that the younger they are, the less likely Jews today are to believe that Jews share a common fate, or to feel solidarity with Israel or the Jewish community. Anthropologists tell us that "ethnicity" as a concept is withering away in North America. Rabbis tell us that Jews are searching for meaning rather than feeling a sense of belonging.

I don't buy it. I think it's premature to pronounce the death of Jewish peoplehood in North America, and especially in Canada.

Our Jewish journeys are filled with peoplehood moments.

When we are awed by Jewish accomplishments – in winning Nobel prizes, in building the miraculous State of Israel – we feel Abraham's sense of belonging to his new tribe, expressed by his need to develop Judaism in a different place than the land, the home, the family, into which he was born.

When we protest the rockets at Sderot, when we mourn the murders of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, when we demand the release of Gilad Schalit, when we lament the 1,000-plus killed by Palestinian terrorists, we feel the sense of shared fate that motivated Ruth's pledge of loyalty to Naomi, which we celebrate on Shavuot.

We feel it when we sit at our seder tables or visit a Holocaust museum or do a roots trip, or read Torah and contemplate Rashi's interpretation from 1,000 years ago of this 3,000-year-old document we read, or marvel with the Haggadah and with Elie Wiesel, who teaches us about our history's timelessness.

Gil Troy in Montreal

When we sing Am Yisrael Chai at a rally, or Od Yishama at a wedding, or get an aliyah in some shul in Prague, we experience the power of community that the great Zionist leader Jacob Klatzkin emphasized by talking about our sense of family and our common destiny.

When we read Pirkei Avot, the Ethics of our Fathers, or more instinctively root our children – and ourselves – in the 3,000-year-old conversation about who we are and who we should be, we appreciate with British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks the depth of Jewish memory and identity, for if we do not remember, if we are amnesiacs, we do not know who we are.

When we meet a stranger in our travels and discover many common topics and common cultural characteristics, we delight with the acerbic comedian Lenny Bruce in our Jewish ethnicity, and we remember his routine about what's Jewish and what's goyish, recalling that New York City and jazz are "Jewish" while baton-twirling and Kool-Aid are "goyish."

When we smell the entrancing smell of freshly baked challah, when we gather with our loved ones for Shabbat or one of the chagim, we affirm with professors Arnie Eisen and Steven Cohen the power of the Jewish family, which they have identified as one of the keystones to modern Jewish identity.

When we experience that little frisson of excitement, the joy of discovery, that some hero, some celebrity, some new friend, despite looking like a regular bloke, is actually Jewish, we sing along with Adam Sandler's Hanukkah Song, celebrating our tribalism, our sometimes secret in-group feeling of solidarity.

When we contemplate the breadth and depth of these associations, how they fill our souls, stretch our minds and occupy our time, we understand the powerful spirit of Jewish civilization that the influential American rabbi, Mordechai Kaplan, described.

And when we give, of ourselves, of our expertise, and of our bounty, we hark back to one of the oldest and most defining of our traditions, taking responsibility as a people, understanding that Jews were counted in the Torah, by giving a half-shekel, by essentially saying, "Count me in!"

This is the symphony of symbols, of senses, of sensibilities, of ideas, of ideologies, of insights, that we get from our sense of Jewish peoplehood. It is a rich ennobling heritage, that we discard, under-appreciate, or underestimate at our own peril.

Hooked on therapy

For the past month or so, I've been hooked on psychotherapy. Not my own, mind you. I've been hooked on the therapy of people named Na'ama, Yadin and Ayala, and the couple's therapy of Michael and Orna.

I've heard it all, every word. I've even been privy to the conversations between their psychologist and his therapist. I've heard it all, seen it all.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Some of you by now realize that I'm not confessing to illegal recordings of private meetings, or to sitting behind one-way glass. I'm talking about B'Tipul, a runaway blockbuster series on Israeli television. The series has been so successful that it has been adapted – some would say softened – by HBO into a program by the same name in English, In Treatment.

For nine successive weeks, five nights a week, viewers tune in to a half-hour program that consists of little more than psychotherapy in Reuven's home office, punctuated by occasional interruptions by members of his family. My husband and I picked up the DVD of the first season on our last trip to Israel, and we've been glued to it.

What's the appeal of B'Tipul? As good literature and drama does, it reveals the inner lives of other people in a way rarely open to us in real life: their fears, vulnerabilities, secrets, struggles. It hints at our resemblances to them, to the ways in which we, to use Joseph Conrad's phrase, are secret sharers. B'Tipul gives evidence of the maturation of Israeli television from over-the-top silly into a vehicle for serious drama.

For us, part of its appeal is the window it provides into Israeli society. But given its easy transposition into a popular American HBO offering – a result of the universal, or at least broadly western, angst of the metupalim (those in therapy) – what exactly is Israeli about B'Tipul?

Most obviously, it's in Hebrew, and it's available so far only with Hebrew subtitles. Linguistically, the program keeps us up to date with contemporary spoken Hebrew, and the slang that characterizes different age and social groups. There is a directness to the dialogue in B'Tipul, a forcefulness of speech long considered part of the Israeli way of being.

The program also reveals the pervasiveness of English phrases and expressions, inserted seamlessly into spoken Hebrew – such as "big deal" (as in "zeh lo beeg deel" – it's no big deal), "on-and-off" (to describe yachasim – or relationships), "timing" (instead of the Hebrew ituy), and a lexicon of the unprintable in this newspaper – which is also a way of showing the influence of American culture in Israel. That B'Tipul and other Israeli programs in turn influence the output of North American television – Newsweek called Israel "Hollywood's cheat sheet" – says something about the increasing globalization of cultural production that has come to characterize our new century, and the softening of the boundaries that distinguish one society from another.

Although the HBO clone hews closely to the original in terms of characters and their therapeutic situations, certain aspects of the characters' lives seem particularly Israeli – the independence of teenagers, for example, or the legacy of the Holocaust on later generations. There is an element of social closeness, as well: all the metupalim seem to know about the therapist's private life and that of his children.

The very popularity of the show in Israel is a sign of a sea change that has occurred in Israeli society over the past several decades – namely, the popular acceptance of the discourse of psychotherapy in Israel. In watching it, I recalled something that an Israeli friend, now in his 50s, told me a number of years ago. He said that when he speaks about himself most intimately, he speaks in English rather than in Hebrew, because it was from North American friends that he had learned to credit the reality and importance of his inner life. The Israel in which he was raised was a pragmatic society with little indulgence for what was considered navel-gazing.

That pragmatism remains, but Israeli society has also grown, matured, and become self-aware and more contemplative. Its fascination with a program like B'Tipul, and its openness to psychoanalytic discourse more generally is born, no doubt, of a combination of difficult times and some measure of affluence. But where better to embrace, develop and evolve what many have seen as the secular Jewish legacy begun by Freud in a diaspora that eventually burned his books.

The Kirshner File

Film festival movies explored various themes

Jewish Vilna before and during the Holocaust. The unlikely relationship between a Jewish woman and an Arab man in contemporary France. A Jewish wedding in Mexico and the gossip and backstabbing it touches off. The diaries of a German anti-Nazi.

These were the themes of four of the movies screened at the 16th edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in the spring. These films are bound to surface at different venues in the future.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The World Was Ours: The Jewish Legacy of Vilna, directed by Mira Jedwabnik Van Doren, focuses on a vibrant, fondly remembered outpost of Yiddish culture before the outbreak of World War II. Although Vilna had a Jewish population of 60,000, far less than that of Toronto or Montreal, the contributions of its Jewish community were legion, way out of proportion to its actual numbers.

A city of diverse nationalities and languages, Vilna was primarily inhabited by Lithuanians, Poles, Russians and Jews. Lithuania, once an imperial power, fell under the sway of the Russian empire, but reverted to Polish rule after World War I. Absorbed by the Soviets in 1939 and occupied by the Nazis in 1941, Lithuania reverted to Soviet rule in 1945. Finally, in 1990, Lithuania declared independence, the first former Soviet republic to do so.

Jews in Lithuania, granted rights and privileges in the 16th century, used their freedom to build an impressive community anchored by a rich tradition of Jewish scholarship. When Napoleon Bonaparte passed through, he described Vilna as "the Jerusalem of Lithuania." Despite its reverence for the past, Vilna was open to modernity, being the birthplace of the Bund – the Jewish socialist movement – and the Yiddish Scientific Institute (YIVO).

The World Was Ours, narrated by Mandy Patinkin and pieced together by archival footage, photographs, diaries, letters and poems, accentuates the positive. With Poland's takeover, a wave of pogroms convulsed Lithuania, yet the manifestation of violent anti-Semitism did not crimp Vilna's status as a hub of Jewish learning and culture. With no fewer than 200 Jewish clubs, organizations and institutions, Vilna was a beacon of light in a dark landscape. As the shadow of fascism fell across Europe, Lithuania could not shield itself from its baneful influences. Van Doren documents these malevolent developments in sober detail.

The German conquest of Lithuania brought unimaginable horrors, notably the massacres of Jews in the Ponary forest. Yet even during this period, when a unified Jewish resistance movement arose to fight the Nazis, concerts and plays were performed in the crowded ghetto. Jewish Vilna has never really recovered from the Holocaust, but its image as a jewel in the crown of pre-war Jewish life in Europe remains intact. As a survivor says, "It's important for the world to know how we lived, not only how we died." It is in this positive spirit that Van Doren constructs her heartfelt documentary.

Bad Faith opens on a high note as Clara (Cecile de France) informs Ismail (Roschdy Zem), her boyfriend of four years, that she is pregnant with his child. They are a happy couple in love, but once reality sets in, their contentment is tested to the maximum.

The drama begins as Clara, a Jew, informs her secular parents that she is bringing her boyfriend, a Moroccan Muslim, for dinner. Implausibly enough, Clara and Ismail have kept their romance a secret until now. "Is he one of us?" asks Clara's mother. "He's French," replies Clara, fudging Ismail's identity. As Bad Faith unfolds, the complications multiply as Clara and Ismail realize that they cannot insulate themselves from their respective backgrounds. Ismail gets upset when Clara wants to place a mezuzah on their door frame, while Clara seethes when Ismail announces his intention to name the baby boy after his late father, Abdelkarim.

Frustrated by their growing differences, Ismail lashes out. "You can't handle the fact that I'm an Arab," he shouts. By now, he has come under pressure from his mother to observe the Muslim holiday of Ramadan.

The film, also directed by Zem, is convincingly realistic until the last few scenes. With its mushy happy ending, it degenerates and becomes merely formulaic and pat.

My Mexican Shiva, a dark comedy by Alejandro Springall, is set in the Polanco quarter of Mexico City. Moishe, the patriarch of the Tartakovsky clan, collapses as he dances to the beat of mariachi music at a wedding. The camera pans on his corpse as it is washed, scrubbed and primped at a mortuary for its final journey.

A scene from My Mexican Shiva

Vilna before World War II

Judging by the scuttlebutt at the shiva, Moishe was not an exemplary character and may yet be heading to hell. The two "angels" who debate his fate, bearded and black-hatted folkish Jews who exchange acidic comments about him in Yiddish, have yet to reach a final verdict. In the meantime, the gossip about Moishe's sexual and financial indiscretions flies thick and fast as the people who have solemnly gathered to remember him deal with their own convoluted problems.

The film unfolds in segments corresponding to each day of the shiva. A mother asks a daughter whether she is still a virgin. A father and a son argue, and two men quarrel. A maid is chastised after mixing meat and milk. A man comes to collect a $2,000 debt. The police arrive to arrest an earnest young man, fresh from a yeshiva in Israel and sporting haredi earlocks, on an old drug charge. Moishe's son flirts with his father's apparent mistress.

My Mexican Shiva contains all the elements of a rousing story, but in the telling it is slow and ponderous, lacking finesse and panache.

My Opposition - The Diaries of Friedrich Kellner works on two overlapping levels. It is about a devoted social democrat in Germany who expressed his disdain of Nazism by keeping a diary in which he recorded the crimes of Hitler's regime. His American grandson, Robert Scott Kellner, uses Kellner's diaries to alert a new generation to the dangers of totalitarianism.

Kellner denounced Hitler as "a crafty criminal" and "the bloodiest tyrant." When he realized that his son, Fred, had been mesmerized by the Nazis, he packed him off to school in the United States. Fred married a Jewish woman, Frieda Shulman, but abandoned her and their three children, including Robert Scott. Frieda, who was not much better than Fred, deposited them at a Jewish orphanage in New Haven after deciding to pursue a career in a circus. After Robert Scott joined the U.S. navy, he was assigned to Saudi Arabia. En route to the Middle East, his plane landed in Germany, and there he found his grandfather in the town of Laubach.

The film, a sentimental journey of discovery, touches on all these points as Robert Scott Kellner delves into his life.

The end of an era

It was the end of an era. On March 30, one of the most famous Jewish delis in the United States, Rascal House, in Sunny Isles Beach, Florida, was unceremoniously torn down. When I read about its demolition, I felt a twinge of regret, having eaten there many times. Rascal House, which opened in 1954 on the corner of Collins Avenue and 172nd Street, was an institution, catering to snow birds and retirees from the East Coast and Canada. Such was its popularity that interminable lineups formed daily. It was a loud, brash, heimish place. The food, while admittedly not of gourmet quality, was wholesome. The portions were generous. In recent years, the queues vanished as the population mix changed. South American and Russian newcomers did not have a yen for pastrami and smoked meat sandwiches or plates piled high with baked brisket and roast potatoes. The Starkmans, the owners, plan to build a gourmet market, Epicure, in its place. I will miss Rascal House.

Rabbi Hirsch Rabiski, the founder of Maon Noam, stands next to the congregation's first permanent home.

Congregation gets permanent home

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

After renting space for more than 15 years, the Maon Noam Jewish Cultural and Educational Network has found a permanent home.

The Maon Noam congregation, which helps new immigrants from the former Soviet Union reconnect to Judaism, recently bought what used to be the Carrville United Church near Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road. Although the new synagogue is still undergoing renovations, the congregation began using the space last month.

"We just started. After the High Holidays, it should be completely renovated," Rabbi Yisroel Fridman of Maon Noam said. "We can expand the building. [It] will be something that can be open 24/7."

Maon Noam currently has several locations across Toronto that provide a range of services from Jewish education and youth programs to bar mitzvah classes and funeral services.

The new synagogue currently runs only a weekly Shabbat service.

Rabbi Hirsch Rabiski, the founder of Maon Noam, hopes to expand the congregation's activities in the new location.

"It will be a place for lessons, lectures, in the future, maybe a day care," Rabbi Rabiski said, adding that the building itself is very meaningful. "This is a historical place. It was a 130-year-old church. We cannot destroy it, only change it."

Rabbi Fridman said Maon Noam is unique because of its philosophy. "One of our main philosophies is [we have] no membership fee. On the High Holidays, everyone's welcome – there's no price tag," he said.

Rabbi Rabiski expanded on the idea of an open synagogue.

"Everybody is welcome. Since we don't have a membership, we can be close to many different people. Many people feel comfortable [here:] They're not afraid of being excluded," he said.

Rabbi Fridman also stressed the importance of volunteers, adding that Rabbi Rabiski is the only rabbi with a salary.

"The synagogue runs on volunteers. They dedicate time to do community service, whether to provide new immigrants with jobs or furniture. The synagogue is funded by donations and volunteers."

Maon Noam was founded by Rabbi Rabiski and a group of volunteers, most of whom had emigrated from Russia. While the congregation started with only a few Jews, it has welcomed thousands of families. The synagogue now serves about 2,000 Jews a year. While some only come for the holidays, others are regular visitors. In order to encourage youth participation, Rabbi Rabiski lets young Jews organize various services and events.

"Younger people [must] lead a Jewish life, not leave it to other people," he said.

Maon Noam also helps reach new immigrants and integrate them into Jewish life, especially those who did not practise Judaism in their country.

"We teach them step by step. We teach them it is necessary to keep Shabbat, to keep kosher. It's their entrance to Judaism," Rabbi Rabiski said.

Rabbi Rabiski, who was born in Russia and later moved to Italy, said he brought a different set of values to Canada.

"It's very different in Russia and Italy. There the approach is that every Jewish service is priceless. Thousands of Jewish people sacrificed to live a Jewish life – it can't be measured in money," he said. "Here, everything had a fee. The point is, Jewishness is not a business, you can't sell or buy it."

Rabbi Rabiski hopes that the new location will attract new people from the developing subdivisions nearby.

The synagogue represents one of the key concepts of Judaism, he said. "The basic point of Jewishness is to love your fellow Jew. It's a basic and simple lesson. To realize it in practice, this is our job."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

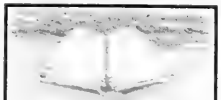
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Happy Av? Yes, you read that right

By RABBI ERIN POLONSKY

Happy Month of Av! Doesn't that sound strange? We are used to wishing each other Happy New Year, Happy Adar (when Purim occurs) or Happy Kislev (the month of Chanukah), but Happy Av?



Rabbinic Reflections

Av is the month of Tisha b'Av, when we mourn the destruction of both Temples and, by extension, of Jewish communal unity. It's a fast day, like Yom Kippur, and a day of mourning, wailing and praying for the restoration of the Temple in Jerusalem.

But during the month of Av we also celebrate a festival called Tu b'Av, the 15th of Av.

The last Mishnah in Masechet Taanit says: "There were no holidays so joyous for the Jewish People as the 15th of Av and Yom Kippur, for on those days, daughters of Jerusalem would go out dressed in borrowed white clothing [so that they would all look the same]."

"And the daughters of Jerusalem would go out and dance in the vineyards located on the outskirts of the city. And everyone who didn't have a wife would go there. And what would they say? 'Young man, lift up your eyes and choose wisely.'"

Tu b'Av has come to be regarded as a festival of love and marriage. In biblical times, it was celebrated with torches and bonfires. In modern-day Israel, some send a bouquet of red roses to a lover or to their closest relatives. Romantic songs are played on the radio and "Holiday of Love" parties are held in the evening throughout the country, most notably on the shores of the Sea of Galilee.

Ari Hakadosh, the renowned mystic, explained that the reason for the greatness of Tu b'Av is that it falls on the 15th of the Hebrew month when the moon is full. The moon represents the Jewish people. Although every month has a full moon, the rise of the moon in Av has a special significance. Since the ninth of Av is the most tragic day of the year, the full moon of Av represents the transformation of tragedy into joy.

Av presents us with a tension – between destruction and creation, sadness and love, reality and hope. It's a tension that we humans encounter whenever we are confronted by our own mortality – injuring ourselves, watching the news, seeing a child cry, buckling our seat belts. At the same time, we hope to transcend the limits of our humanity, to achieve a deep love with a caring partner, to understand the yearnings of our souls, to reach a spiritual plane closer to the divine. Often, when we come closer to reaching this spiritual plane, our humanity pulls us back down. Similarly, when we feel most human and vulnerable, our connection with God can remind us of the things that we truly value.

Human nature teaches us that we must strive for equilibrium, tranquillity and calm. But the month of Av, with its inherent contradictions, teaches us that we are truly human only when we are engaged with the tension that exists in our world. If we ignore the reality, pain, and joy of living in favour of a monastic lifestyle aimed at communing with the divine, we miss out on the human experience. Yet if we pay no attention to our spirit and to the soul's connection to God and concentrate only on the everyday mundane events of our lives, we also miss out on the full range of human experience. Only when we embrace both types of experiences are we living life to its fullest and worshipping God in love.

Happy Av!

Too high a price

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Once again, Tisha b'Av approaches, and we prepare ourselves to hear the words of Jeremiah as he laments the loss of ancient Jerusalem and the Temple. Tradition tells us that we lost both the First and the Second Temples on the same day, the ninth of the month of Av.

When the sages discuss the reasons for the destruction of the Second Temple, the reason most often cited is "baseless hatred" – a hatred that the Jewish people bore for one another that was sitting on nothing, on emptiness. Interestingly, the picture of the Jewish people in the time of the Second Temple is a picture of diversity and differences that spanned the spectrum of interpretation and practice.

One group of Jews believed that only a strict and literal interpretation of Jewish law was acceptable, while another group believed that leniency and latitude were preferable. Another group believed that the political agenda with the Romans should be at the forefront of the Jewish agenda, while yet another group was so worried about assimilation that its members removed themselves to live in isolation from the world around them. It's easy to look at the description of the ancient Jewish world and confuse it with our modern Jewish reality.

Yet what is most interesting is the fact that the hatred that was growing between these groups was ultimately viewed as baseless, empty. The differences that we think define us as Jews and that create an environment of divisiveness are the very differences that the sages have told us carry no weight and are not worth the price we will pay.

Hillel and Shammai are two ancient Jewish Sages who defined the latitudes of different Jewish expressions and interpretations in their time. While Hillel was a humanitarian, Shammai was a scientist. Shammai was strict in his interpretations and Hillel was flexible. One might observe the students of Hillel lighting Chanukah candles and the students of Shammai lighting Chanukah candles and fail to recognize them as both fulfilling the same commandment. And yet we are told by the text that they still ate with each other, prayed with each other and married each other's children.

As Canadians, we strive to live in a tolerant society. By our very language, we have set the parameters to be that we tolerate each other. We abide each other, but the word tolerate, while allowing for other views to exist, does not tell us whether or not to value other views.

For Jews, the model of Hillel and Shammai defines an approach beyond tolerance. When the Talmud asks why we always decide Jewish law by Hillel, we are taught to value one another.

According to a midrashic text, a Voice from heaven informed the sages that both Hillel and Shammai, different as they may be, are correct in their understandings. Yet, if they are both correct, why do we follow Hillel's understanding and not Shammai's?

The text responds that Hillel would always teach his students Shammai's views first, so that they would understand and value that view. Only afterward would Hillel teach them his own views. We reward Hillel by deciding questions of Jewish law according to him. He provided us with a model that moves us beyond tolerance to one of value.

As we approach Tisha b'Av, it's important that we not only remember the Jewish loss encountered on that day, but that we adhere to the warning sent to us through text. If we continue to emphasize our differences and divisions, then it is nothing but baseless hatred, and we will pay the highest of prices.

Perhaps this Tisha b'Av, it's time to listen to the Book of Lamentations being read in a synagogue other than the one we routinely visit.

In Hillel's words, if not now, when?

The Phoenicians were Mediterranean catalysts

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The Phoenicians are one of the most fascinating yet enigmatic civilizations we have from antiquity. Geographically, linguistically and culturally, they were very close to our ancestors in ancient Israel. The land of Phoenicia made up the northern part of Canaan, with Israel as the southern part. Ancient Phoenicia corresponded basically to modern Lebanon, where the majority of its settlements were found, although some extended farther south into what is now Israel.

I was fortunate to have been involved in the excavation of at least one Phoenician site in Israel for two seasons. It was Achziv, in northern Israel, not far from the town of Nahariya.

The excavations at Achziv were directed by my friend Elat Mazar, who is now in charge of the excavations outside the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem, where there is evidence that she may have found David's palace, which would have been built by Phoenician builders using their famous cedars. Likewise, the Bible tells us that David's son, Solomon, used Phoenician builders to build the First Temple.

Mazar's archeological pedigree is impeccable. She is the granddaughter of one of the founders of biblical archeology in Israel, Benjamin Mazar, who, in addition to having been the president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, was also the founder of the Institute of Archaeology at that institution.

At Achziv, Mazar found a Phoenician cemetery from the ninth century BCE, an important period for both the Phoenicians and ancient Israel. It was a time when the mighty Assyrian Empire was encroaching on the Phoenicians and the two Hebrew kingdoms to the south, one of which, Israel, it would destroy and then carry off its inhabitants into captivity, giving rise to the story of the Ten Lost Tribes. But unfortunately, Achziv was too late a site to tell us anything about Phoenician origins.

As with much of Canaanite culture, Phoenician origins are to be found in the Bronze Age (3200-1200 BCE). Archeology cannot tell us as much about their beginnings as we would like to know, since some of the sites are still inhabited, while others were very dangerous to excavate because of the ongoing civil war and violence that still grip Lebanon.

The Bible is an important outside source of information on the Phoenicians. From it, we know that ancient Israel had close relations with the Phoenicians, especially the city of Tyre. One of its kings, Ahab, was married to the Tyrian princess Jezebel.

It was Jezebel's family that would establish the most famous Phoenician colony of all – Carthage. Carthage, under its famous general, Hannibal (whose name preserves the infamous Phoenician deity, Baal), almost defeated Rome in a life and death struggle for control of the Mediterranean in the late third century BCE.

The Phoenicians' major claim to fame is their invention of the alphabet and their role as intermediaries between the Semitic east and European west, and it is ironic that the people who invented the alphabet have left us so few records. Still, their inscriptions have been found all across the Mediterranean, reaching as far as Spain in the west. Some have even put forward the notion that they crossed the Atlantic, claiming the Paraiba Inscription found in Brazil as their evidence; however, the majority of scholars look upon this as a clever forgery.

But it was the Phoenician invention of the alphabet that changed the intellectual horizon of civilization. It was the alphabet that democratized knowledge and made possible the transmission of the lofty ideals of the prophets and our Bible, as well as the epics of Homer, the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle, the plays of Sophocles and Aeschylus, and countless other great works.

Israeli hopefuls & the Olympic Games

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today we conclude our look at the Olympics with a look at Israel's medalists, a preview of the country's team in Beijing and a fascinating – but wild – dream for the future.

This year's delegation from Israel is very different from the one the country sent when it first competed in Helsinki in 1952. Back then, the most notable achievement was by Yoav Ra'anan, who took ninth place in springboard diving. [tinyurl.com/5k4436] Over the next four decades, participating was Israel's main objective. Israelis have taken home a total of six medals since the 1992 games in Barcelona. [tinyurl.com/4fl6zs]

So Israel doesn't just want to participate nowadays. It wants to win. But before Israeli athletes get to Beijing, they have to get past Gili Lustig first. Lustig must approve of every competitor going to the Olympics. "After more than 20 years of activity for the [government's] Elite Sport Department, we can say with confidence that the athletes representing us in the games are the best; the ones that withstood the hardest tests we set for them, in world championships and European championships. We're going to the games to win." Lustig's resolve doesn't make him popular with everyone. He's had to defend his choices before the Israel Olympic Committee, as well as in Israeli courts, including the High Court of Justice. [tinyurl.com/5ajaux]

This year's delegation is Israel's largest ever. You can see their beaming faces and Hebrew bios at the Olympic Committee of Israel's official site. [tinyurl.com/5m4ar6] There are a few pages in English, but the site really excels in Hebrew with a summary of how Israel has fared at past Olympics, bios and pictures of this year's hopefuls. [olympic.tapuz.co.il]. Even if you don't speak Hebrew, don't miss the dozens of videos of the athletes in action. [tinyurl.com/66snjo] (I did find the navigation on this site quite finicky. It worked best using Internet Explorer on a PC.)

The best English site to read up about the current Israeli team is at Wikipedia. Each of the 40-plus candidates is listed and many are linked to stories from the Jerusalem Post. [tinyurl.com/3hljlb]

So who are the athletes to watch? Start with Michael Kolganov, who will carry the Israeli flag during the opening ceremonies. Kolganov, who made aliyah from Tashkent, Uzbekistan, in 1995, won bronze five years later in canoeing at Sydney. [tinyurl.com/57xz48]

Ariel Ze'evi is back, too. The three-time European champion won bronze in Athens in 2004 in Judo. Watch him take on the competition in some great video at judovision.org. [tinyurl.com/6pbfqn] (Gal Fridman who claimed Israel's only gold – for windsurfing in Athens – won't be back. [tinyurl.com/6rd9or])

At 53, Haile Satayin will be one of the oldest competitors in Beijing. (His passport says he's 53, although he claims he's only 48). Satayin was airlifted to Israel in 1991, along with 14,000 Ethiopian Jews. He says that after he got to Israel, he began to gain weight and was looking for a way to slim down. He found it in competitive marathon running. Satayin placed 20th in Athens and hopes to do better in Beijing. [tinyurl.com/4kdloa]

There will be over three dozen more Israeli athletes competing in Beijing. For daily progress reports, check out the Jerusalem Post [jpost.com] and the English language edition of Ha'aretz. [haaretz.com] Once the Games begin, there's bound to be more information at the official site for the Beijing Olympics. [en.beijing2008.cn]

A few years ago, three architectural students from Tel Aviv University suggested what seemed then – and now – like a preposterous idea: that their city consider hosting the Olympic Games in 2012. Their proposal got the attention of Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai but was ridiculed by practically everyone else. Israel's bid never got off the ground… and the world will be focused on London, not Tel Aviv, in four years. [tinyurl.com/6j3b3w]

But all that didn't bother the writer of an article in Ha'aretz: "It is easy to respond with cynicism or derision to this ambitious proposal… In the 50 years of its existence, Israel has proved that it is capable of grappling with huge and complex projects in a short time. So it would be advisable to seriously examine the feasibility of holding an Olympiad in Israel." Maybe one day.

Principals learn how to implement change

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cathy Lowenstein, principal of Vancouver Talmud Torah, says that because of where she lives, she is "a little bit away from the day school world" and lacks some of the resources available in the more major Jewish centres.

"Just like you have to work harder to keep your own children engaged, you have to work harder [as a Jewish educator] to keep yourself engaged in Jewish education," she told The CJN in a phone interview.

Lowenstein was one of 18 educators, among them five Canadians, to take part in the 10th annual principals' program hosted by Bar-Ilan University's Lookstein Center for Jewish Education, in partnership with the Avi Chai Foundation.

The "summer seminar" took place July 7 to 17, but all the participants are instituting year-long, in-school "action research projects" under the guidance of mentors, and they will meet again for a February seminar in Florida. They're expected to submit final reports on their projects next summer.

Lowenstein, a native of Winnipeg who taught at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School for four years, was matched with mentor Shana Harris, Bialik's director of education.

"She's the one who helped to instil [in me] an interest in being part of a Jewish day school," said Lowenstein, whose school is a community school with more than 500 students from preschool to Grade 7.

Harris has expertise in teacher mentoring, the subject of Lowenstein's year-long project. Lowenstein, who plans to institute a formal mentoring program at VTT instead of continuing with the informal mentoring that has been in place, recalls that Harris assigned her to a mentor during her own first year at Bialik.

Although Lowenstein had had 20 years of experience in the public school system, she found her first year at a Jewish school "very challenging." Often, she said, new teachers are unfamiliar with the dual-language curriculum and "rigorous routine." They may also welcome input on issues related to their first parent-teacher nights and report cards, she noted.

"We want to keep teachers in Jewish education," Lowenstein said. "Sometimes they come in – fine teachers – but they don't come forward to talk about the stress until it's too late, and at the end of the year, they're already going somewhere else. This way, we'll be able to support them appropriately from the beginning."

Joyce Kerr – a vice-principal of Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education and a 2006 recipient of the Jewish Education Service of North America's (JESNA) Grinspoon-Steinhardt Awards for Excellence in Jewish Education – is planning a tfillah project that will start with the school's Grade 1 students.

Kerr, who also teaches Grade 1 Judaic studies, said the project will focus on using a "value word" from each prayer the students learn as a basis for discussion and artwork.

Kerr, whose school has about 570 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 12, expects the project will give students a way to relate the prayer to themselves, and is hoping to expand it in coming years to higher grades.

"[Tfillah] is their talk time with God," she said. "It's very hard for Grade 1s, because it's not concrete, so I'm hoping the value words are going to connect them personally."

On a larger scale, she noted, the process of implementing change through an action research project is a tool that the principals are now familiar with and will be able to use again in the future.

"You don't make the changes just like that," she said.

Like Lowenstein, Kerr was struck by the diversity of the participants in the Lookstein program, ranging from leaders of yeshivot to schools that serve an entire community.

Retention of students and the cost of Jewish education were among the common issues that arose in discussion, she said.

Rabbi Yamin Benarroch, vice-principal of the high school division of Montreal's Hebrew Academy, an Orthodox school that serves about 230 students from Grade 7 to Grade 11 (and a total of about 650 from pre-kindergarten to Grade 11), will focus his research project on methods and strategies to improve student achievement and increase interest in Torah study.

"I think it's the challenge of every Jewish day school and yeshiva high school," he said.

He plans to work on the methodologies together with his staff, he said. "I want it to be collaborative."

Rabbi Benarroch said the Lookstein program was "on a very high level, with very motivated participants and demanding staff who pushed us very hard."

Other Canadian participants were Leia Ger-Rogers of the Kehila Jewish Community School in Hamilton, Ont., and Ben Karmel of the Calgary Jewish Academy. As well, Ted Walker of Toronto's Eitz Chaim Schools is serving as a mentor.

Correction

The story "Canadian University presidents visit Jewish state" (CJN, July 31) indicated that Allan Rock, the current president of the University of Ottawa, was among those who visited Israel in June. In fact, Gilles Patry was president of the University of Ottawa when the trip took place. Rock assumed the presidency immediately following the trip.

An additional bit of information is that during the visit, Patry finalized a faculty-student exchange program between the University of Ottawa and the Radzyner School of Law at the Interdisciplinary Centre in Herzliya. He also learned that a new exchange program in law with the University of Haifa had been recognized.

The CJN regrets the error.

Consensus emerges on a nuclear Iran

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Recently, Israel has been visited by a slew of world leaders and would-be leaders. British Prime Minister Gordon Brown, French President Nicolas Sarkozy and United States senator and presidential hopeful Barack Obama have all held meetings with Israeli leaders.

During these visits, the Canadian and international media reported a similar message from the travelling politicians: a nuclear Iran is a threat not only to Israel, but also to the broader region and to world stability, and it must be stopped. Economic sanctions and diplomacy are the preferred way to achieve this, but they're not the only options.

The reality is that the efforts to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons have been inconsistent so far.

Even though Iran has the world's second-largest oil reserves and the fourth-largest gas reserves, it has relatively few oil refineries. Iran must import much of its refined oil, which, even at low, state-subsidized prices, has led to severe fuel shortages for a population that is already suffering from a 25 per cent inflation rate. And all of this is true despite record high OPEC oil prices, and the fact that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was elected on a platform of economic prosperity for the average family.

Despite three rounds of (albeit mild and limited) United Nations-imposed economic sanctions, Iran's leaders seem determined to push ahead with the development of nuclear fuel enrichment – the key and most difficult ingredient in a nuclear weaponization program.

Iran, of course, staunchly denies that it's developing nuclear weapons, saying that it's only interested in nuclear energy.

Around mid-July, a round of European Union-Iranian negotiations (also involving the participation of a senior U.S. State Department official) resulted in a plan, with a two-week deadline, that would see Iran at least temporarily suspend its nuclear enrichment program in exchange for a halt to further sanctions.

In response, Tehran said only that it would "consider" the proposal. Many in the West suspected that Iran was only interested in stalling for time to pursue its nuclear ambitions. On July 30, Reuters reported that Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei defiantly asserted on Iranian state radio (just before the deadline was to expire) that his nation is committed to pursuing its nuclear program "to provide electricity."

In the meantime, a consensus appears to be building in Israel that, in spite of the many risks involved, Israel cannot allow Iran to plow ahead with its nuclear ambitions.

On July 19, the eve of Obama's visit to Israel, Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi published "Dear Barack Obama" in the New Republic's online edition.

In this open letter, Klein Halevi outlined Israel's security concerns: "Terror enclaves have emerged on two of our borders… The unthinkable has already happened: missiles on Haifa and Ashkelon, exploding buses in Jerusalem, hundreds of thousands of Israelis transformed into temporary refugees… The entire country is now within missile range of Iran and its terrorist proxies."

Klein Halevi continued: "Above all else, we dread a nuclear Iran. With few exceptions, the consensus within the political and security establishment is that Israel cannot live with an Iranian bomb. In the U.S., a debate has begun over whether the Iranian regime is rational or apocalyptic. In truth, no one knows whether the regime, or elements within it, would be mad enough to risk nuclear war. But precisely because no one knows, Israel will not place itself in a position to find out."

Those ominous but sober words are shared, as Klein Halevi notes, by Israel's leadership – the same leadership that is pushing, against hope it seems, for the international community to apply the sort of economic and diplomatic pressures on Iran that might force it to halt its nuclear work. Should that fail, as Israeli, European and American officials have said, the military option – as risky as it is – remains on the table.

But the truth is, the situation is so fluid that any prediction made now cannot be anything but pure speculation.

Shul hires students for outreach

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Ashkenazi Synagogue, Winnipeg's oldest shul, has hired two summer students to create an outreach program that will teach kids in neighbourhood schools about Judaism and the area's Jewish history.

In late spring, the north end congregation received a federal grant from Human Resources and Skills Development Canada to hire two students over the summer months for a variety of tasks. The most important priority for Greg Lipschitz and Matthew Bernstein is to develop the outreach program, said Gerald Minuk, one of the shul's leaders.

The Ashkenazi Synagogue dates from the early 1920s. Its original building was destroyed by fire in the late 1940s and was subsequently rebuilt at the same location. The current building dates from around 1948.

The surrounding area was home to most of Winnipeg's Jewish residents in the first half of the last century, but today there are few, if any, Jews living in the rundown inner city area, and the synagogue is one of the few remnants – along with the Chesed Shel Emes funeral chapel, the soon-to-be closed North Winnipeg Sharon Home for elderly seniors and two kosher bakeries – of that earlier Jewish presence. Nonetheless, it continues to have a morning minyan and Shabbat morning services.

The genesis for this new project was an attack by vandals on the venerable building three years ago that left most of its windows broken. At the time, Minuk approached a local principal for moral support. The principal urged the congregation to come out of its isolation and reach out to the neighbouring community.

"This grant is helping us to do that," Minuk said. "Our summer students are developing a curriculum for the schools that will teach students about the Jewish religion, the Jewish history of the area and the history of the Ashkenazi."

Minuk said the shul hired one high school student – Bernstein attends Winnipeg's St. Paul's High School – and one university student – Lipschitz will attend the University of Western Ontario in the fall – in order to reflect different educational perspectives.

As well as producing a school curriculum, Lipschitz and Bernstein are computerizing the synagogue's yahrzeit board so that family members can be notified about when to say Kaddish.

They are also cleaning up the shul's basement, which Minuk hopes will house a coffee shop and museum that would focus on Winnipeg's Jewish north end.

Minuk said he has been in contact with the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada (JHC) about the feasibility of the museum idea.

Speaking for the JHC, University of Winnipeg history professor Dan Stone said the JHC is willing to work with anyone who is interested in promoting the study and preservation of western Canadian Jewish history.

As to whether or not the congregation's leadership will apply for another grant for next summer, that will depend on how much Lipschitz and Bernstein are able to accomplish this year, Minuk said.

"We will probably focus more on the museum next summer," he said.

Comedian comes to terms with Judaism

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

The first time Toronto comic Alex Kojfman performed standup, things didn't go well.

"I was 19, and it was new-talent night at Yuk Yuk's," he said. "I went up there all cocky, going, 'It's going to be hilarious.' I got one joke off and the rest I just improvised."

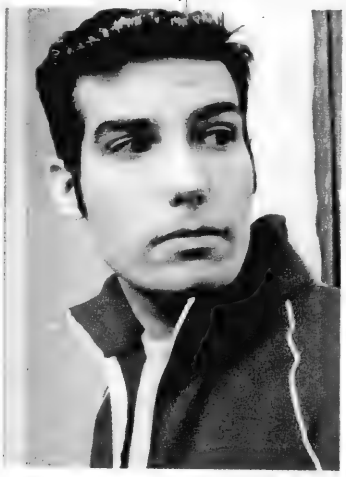
That's when the show went downhill.

"I stunk it up pretty hard. I did the Ace Ventura, talking-out-of-the-ass thing because I had nothing else to say. One friend of mine, he came up to me and just patted me on the shoulder without saying a word and walked away," he said.

"It was very new to me, the whole talking into the mike, the light, the audience. It's very disorienting."

Still, Kojfman did not give up.

"I just figured from that moment I can only do better," he said. "In order to be a comic, you need to fail. There's no such thing as getting up onstage and becoming an overnight success, it takes years to get comfortable on stage."



Alex Kojfman has been performing standup since he was 19.

After Kofjman's first show, he started performing once or twice a year while getting his business degree at Laurier University.

"I always wanted to quit university, but I knew better. It was just the feeling that it wasn't something I was going to do," he said.

After school, Kojfman did "what any person would." He worked at Blockbuster and waited tables. After realizing that he didn't want to spend the rest of his life in a Blockbuster uniform, Kojfman decided to enrol in Humber's comedy program.

"It was a way to escape working – some people do their master's, I wanted to be more funny," he said, before quickly correcting himself. "Well, not more funny, you can't be more funny."

While at Laurier, Kojfman started an improv group named after an egg carton label called Calibre: Gros.

"[I was] doing it for five years, and I was writing sketches for Humber and still doing standup. It was a lot," he said. "When I finished that, I just started doing comedy seriously, performing at the Laugh Resort and doing open mikes."

Since then, Kojfman has performed at the Just For Laughs comedy festival and several clubs, including appearances at Yuk Yuk's, the Sage Theater in New York and Absolute Comedy in Ottawa and Toronto.

Kojfman may not yet be world renowned, but he is a natural comedian. Whether on stage or simply in conversation, jokes role off his tongue.

Kojfman partly attributes this ability to his religion.

"Being Jewish means we ask questions all the time," he said. "I over-analyze, I try to find the humour and break things down... You ask, 'Why would it make me laugh? Why would it make someone else laugh?'" he said.

When he was starting out, Kojfman, whose parents emigrated from Israel, hesitated to put his religion into his act.

"I used to never admit I was a Jew on stage when I first started. I thought there was a Nazi somewhere in the audience," he said. "I went to Jewish school all my life – it was kind of shoved down your throat."

His attitude changed after his first trip to Israel.

"I just came to terms with my Judaism. I came back and developed a relationship and a connection with Israel and Judaism, with who I am," he said.

Growing up, Kojfman didn't fall into any Jewish stereotypes.

"I didn't grow up in Thornhill, my parents aren't doctors. They're blue-collar," he said.

"I'm trying to bring [Judaism] into [my act] a little more... but I don't want it to be defining. I'm not a Jewish comic, I'm a comedian who's Jewish."

Kojfman has a day job as the Canadian director of MASA Israel. He also works with Canada Israel Experience and travels from city to city promoting long-term trips to Israel.

Kojfman stops in at comedy clubs in the cities he visits. Recently, he performed at a club in Jerusalem.

"The guys [at the club] told me no sex and no swearing, which basically took out 80 per cent of my act," he said. "I did well, but I was a little nervous. If you swear, God's watching."

Apparently, Jewish audiences are tough.

"Jewish people are the hardest people to make laugh," he said. "I've had people come up to me after a show and go, 'you were really funny.' But [they] weren't laughing, all the non-Jews were laughing."

Kojfman has produced The Colours of Comedy, a standup show dedicated to showing off diverse comedians. The first show brought in around 80 people and featured a range of comics from an Indian Catholic to a Muslim and a "white guy."

"I wanted to create a show where the diversity on stage is also reflected in the audience... and to write something that brought people together. There's so much more to comedy than male and white."

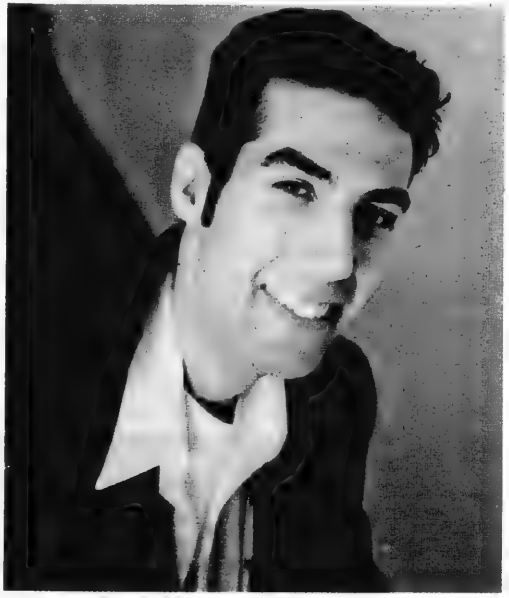
Kojfman is hoping to do his fourth Colours of Comedy show and is currently in the process of finding a venue.

Kojfman's jokes are easy for the audience to relate to.

"Deep down, there are very basic things that make us laugh. Relationships, funny situations," he said. "I have no filters. I'll say whatever's on my mind, but it's funny. If you get it, then you get it."

Kojfman performs in Toronto at the Absolute Comedy club on Aug. 7 and at Yuk Yuk's on Aug. 26.

For more information, visit his website at www.alexk.ca.



Kojfman has performed in Toronto, New York, Ottawa and Jerusalem.

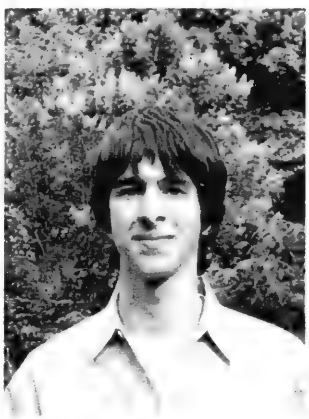
Student graduates with near-perfect average

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

School was never a struggle for 18-year-old Robert Kleinman.

Kleinman, who just finished Grade 12 at North Toronto Collegiate Institute, graduated with a 99.8 per cent average in his top six classes, the highest overall average in the Toronto District School Board.



Robert Kleinman

"I worked very hard," Kleinman said. "I spent about three hours studying each night. I really tried to understand the basics."

While Kleinman did well in English this year, his best subjects were math, computer science, economics and biology, the first three of which he scored 100 per cent in.

Along with the three hours of studying he put in each night, Kleinman was the captain of the senior boys swim team, he participated in past Canadian Jewish News chess tournaments and he was the captain of the Reach for the Top team, which competes in a national trivia quiz show of the same name.

"There's time to do it all," Kleinman said of his extracurricular activities. "I guess you have to manage your time fairly well."

According to his mother, Debbie Schachter, Kleinman has always been a good student.

"He's a bright boy, he's always done his work and always tried to understand everything he's been asked to learn," she said.

This year, Kleinman participated in the National Biology Competition. He won first place and received a $5,000 scholarship to the University of Toronto.

Even though Kleinman has always achieved high grades, his parents were still surprised by his average.

"We were shocked. It's hard to believe that our kid is a top student," Schachter said. "Although we knew it was possible when we saw his grade-point average."

Kleinman attributes some of his success to his teachers.

"I had a lot of very good high school teachers, many that have pushed me along the way in order to always keep achieving and improving," he said. "[Without these teachers] I would have never been pushed and stimulated in the same way."

While Kleinman has a strong work ethic, he makes time to socialize.

"There's a lot of things I enjoyed about high school – hanging out with friends, going to movies. It was always a lot of fun," he said. "You still have time to do things on weekends, as long as you study on the week nights."

Kleinman also finds time to hang out with his two younger brothers, aged 14 and 16, who may be following in his footsteps.

"They've got very good work ethics as well. Their marks are about the same as mine were at their age," he said.

This fall, Kleinman plans to take life sciences at U of T and may apply to medical school after he gets his undergraduate degree.

"I've always wanted to go [to University of Toronto.] It has a very good reputation," he said. "I'm interested by life sciences. For awhile I've wanted to become a doctor, for almost as long as I can remember."

'I had a lot of very good high school teachers'

Kleinman is spending his summer volunteering at a sleep lab.

"I'm doing a little bit of a research project," he said. "It's fun. I'm learning quite a bit. The sort of stuff I'm doing now is very different than school."

Jay Feinberg celebrates his second 'bar mitzvah'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Jay Feinberg considers that he has had two bar mitzvahs. The first was when he turned 13. This summer, he is marking what he regards as his second – the 13th anniversary of his getting a life-saving bone marrow transplant.

Feinberg was in Toronto recently for a brunch held at Bistro Grande restaurant, where he thanked volunteers, bone marrow donors and bone marrow recipients.

He was a 23-year-old foreign exchange analyst for the Federal Reserve Bank in New York City when he discovered he had developed chronic myelogenous leukemia. His only hope for survival was a bone marrow transplant.

When it was discovered that neither his parents, brothers nor anyone else in the family was a match for him, the family sprang into action.

For four years, family, friends and supporters ran blood screening drives in the United Sates, Canada, Israel, and even Belarus. Thousands of people were tested at various drives around Toronto. Although matches were found for many others, none were appropriate for him.

It wasn't until he was close to death that a donor was found at one of the drives in Windsor, Ont.

Feinberg is now considered cured and devotes his time to Gift of Life, an organization based in Boca Raton, Fla., that runs clinics to find bone marrow donors, offers support and help to those who need transplants for themselves or someone they know, and encourages people to be tested. He is executive director.

The whole process of being tested and donating bone marrow has been greatly simplified over the years, Feinberg said. Instead of having blood drawn, all that's required is a cheek swab.

As well, he said, in many cases, rather than the traditional bone marrow donation, which requires full or local anesthetic, stem cells are taken from the peripheral blood system or from umbilical cord blood. Gift of Life is encouraging the saving and storage of umbilical cord blood, Feinberg said.

At the moment, umbilical cord blood is stored in private facilities, at a high cost. Feinberg wants to encourage the creation of public banks of umbilical cord blood, which would operate the same way as national and international bone marrow registries do.

Another new venture of Gift of Life is what Feinberg calls its ambassador program. "We want to start a speakers bureau, where either donors or recipients volunteer to speak to groups about bone marrow transplantation," he said.

Dan Levy, 27, a property manager, was tested during a mass screening at York University, when he was a student there. In the fall of 2006, he was called and asked to be a donor.

"I would do it again," he said. "It's something anyone could do – and should do."

In 2003, Charlie Abecis was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia. Since he is a Sephardi Jew, and Sephardim are poorly represented in bone marrow registries, finding a bone marrow donor was a difficult proposition. Finally, though, a perfect match donor was found in Europe.

"It was such a gift," Abecis said emotionally.

Feinberg promised that "we will not rest until we can find a perfect match for everyone who needs it."

Obituary

Beth Sholom founding rabbi 'considered everyone a friend'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi David Monson, known fondly as "the people's rabbi," died last week. He was 91.

He was founding rabbi and later rabbi emeritus of Beth Sholom Synagogue. The last time he was in the shul was last fall, when he received an aliyah in honour of his 90th birthday.

Rabbi Monson was proud to have served in the Canadian army as a chaplain during World War II. At his funeral, his casket was escorted into the Beth Sholom sanctuary by an honour guard of Canadian Jewish veterans.

As a chaplain, he served soldiers in Kirkland Lake, Belleville and Camp Borden in Ontario, as well as in London, England.

Rabbi David Monson

When he left the army, he was one of the first spiritual leaders of the new Shaarei Shomayim Congregation before joining the even newer Beth Sholom.

All the speakers at the funeral – officiating Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl; Shaarei Tefillah Congregation spiritual leader Rabbi Moshe Stern; Rabbi Monson's nephew, Rabbi Asher Vale, and the rabbi's grandson, Stuart Waldman – praised Rabbi Monson for his many acts of kindness, his humility and his phenomenal memory, which allowed him to effortlessly recall people's names, their parents, where they lived and what business they were in.

He had an inexhaustible store of anecdotes – funny, sad and historical.

Waldman said that his grandfather "considered everyone a friend. He saw everyone – from the mayor to the prime minister to the ordinary man on the street – as equal."

He remembered Rabbi Monson once coming home barefoot, because he had given his shoes to a poor man he had met.

Rabbi Monson found jobs and homes for people who needed them, raised funds for a predominately black church, and performed many acts of chesed – kindness – that no one knew about, his grandson said.

He was involved with the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Canada Council and St. Alban's Club for disadvantaged youth. He was also a founder of the former Northwestern Hospital and was a supporter of many causes and institutions both here and in Israel.

But his main love was Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem. Sheila Dropkin, former executive director of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, said that he "brought great passion to his love of Israel and Shaare Zedek."

Sharing that passion not only with his congregation but with everyone he met, Rabbi Monson was able to raise considerable sums of money for the hospital, Dropkin said.

She said that he made several trips to the hospital and developed personal relationships with many of its senior staff.

"He maintained that interest until the end, and his family are still strong donors," she said.

So popular was he for his work for Shaare Zedek that Rabbi Vale talked about meeting a haredi school official in Jerusalem, who, when he realized that Rabbi Vale's wife was Rabbi Monson's niece, jumped up and started praising him.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, current spiritual leader of Beth Sholom, called Rabbi Monson "a huge inspiration," not only to him, but "to the many people in the many places who knew him.

"He will be missed."

Rabbi Monson was predeceased by his wife of nearly 60 years, Sue, and his brother Juair. He is survived by his daughter Judith; grandchildren Beth, Monica and Stuart and his wife Jessica; sister Connie Soberman; brother Daniel and his wife Edith.

Media critic suing French news outlets

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

After successfully defending a defamation case brought by one of France's premier television networks, Philippe Karsenty is going on the offensive.

Karsenty, who runs an online media watchdog organization, has launched two suits against some of France's most prominent news outlets, alleging they have libelled him by comparing him to a "nut case."

The first suit names Canal+, a pay TV company owned by Vivendi SA, and alleges the network aired a documentary "depicting me as a manipulative liar. They said I was the same as those who say 9/11 was an inside job."

The second suit charges L'Express, a weekly magazine, with running an article that described him as a"obsessive nut case and manipulative," Karsenty said.

"We defended against the al-Dura lie. Now it's time to go on the offensive and get the French media to pay the price for supporting an anti-Semitic lie," Karsenty said in a telephone interview from Paris.

Karsenty, a financial consultant who operates Media Ratings (www.m-r.fr), won a historic legal victory in May when a French court dismissed a charge of defamation against him. Karsenty had repeatedly asserted that France2, which has been dubbed "a flagship and establishment channel," aired a news report in September 2000 that was a hoax and an anti-Semitic lie. The TV report claimed Israeli soldiers shot 12-year-old Mohammad al-Dura while he and his father crouched behind a concrete barrel at the Netzarim junction in Gaza. Karsenty questioned whether al-Dura was shot at all and said the false report had vilified Israel and led to attacks against Jews. Al-Dura, moreover, became an international symbol of Israeli ruthlessness and the boy's poster was visible behind Daniel Pearl when the American Jewish journalist was murdered by al-Qaeda.

Karsenty was sued by Charles Enderlin, France2's Jerusalem correspondent, who broadcast the report based on footage and information supplied by a Palestinian stringer, Talal Abu Rahma. Karsenty lost at trial but was vindicated on appeal when a French court ruled his claims were a legitimate criticism of the network and its reporter. Most revealing was that footage shown in court showed Palestinians at Netzarim faking injuries. U.S. Prof. Richard Landes, who had monitored the case, dubbed the news manipulation, "Pallywood."

Karsenty said the French media have lined up behind Enderlin, who they want to protect as a fellow member of France's intellectual establishment. A petition has been launched in Le Nouvel Observateur that supports Enderlin and paints him as some sort of victim, Karsenty said. The petition supports Enderlin's integrity and states, "Seven years. For seven years a despicable campaign of hate has been trying to stain the professional honour of Charles Enderlin. For seven years, there have been those who have tried to present as 'fabricated' and as a 'staged scene' his report that shows how a 12-year-old boy was killed by shots fired from an Israeli position."

Karsenty said supporters of the petition are "personalities who are worried by the fact I was not found guilty. They say there is no right to defame and the justice system is allowing me to defame him. That's not true. The judge found there was no defamation."

And despite the prominence of the signatories, who include Hubert Vardin, former French Foreign Minister, and Theo Klein, former president of CRIF, the major French Jewish organization, 19 of the first 20 comments posted at the paper supported him, Karsenty stated.

"The French people aware of the case are on board with me," he said. "I'm not talking about most of the journalists, the anti-Semitic politicians and the so-called French intellectuals."

"The French media lied about the fact we won the case," he said. "The French media are all complicit in this kind of behaviour – anti-Zionism, anti-Israel, which leads to anti-Semitism.

"France is still the most anti-Semitic country in the Western world and it is very annoying to see that even when we can prove they were manipulating, they'd rather lie and cover up the mistake of their colleague than tell the truth."

Karsenty was also critical of French President Nicolas Sarkozy who has authority to act against France2, which is a state-owned enterprise. The CRIF announced it is asking for a commission of inquiry into the entire affair but Sarkozy has not yet responded, Karsenty said. He speculated that Sarkozy's advisers are misleading him about the al-Dura affair. "His mistake is that he took the former advisors of Jacques Chirac. That tells you a lot. Chirac was so anti-Israel, anti-Western world, so the policy can't change."

Karsenty was also critical of the Israeli government, which "is not taking advantage of this huge victory. It's time for them to take advantage" by demonstrating that the public had been duped about the news in Israel and that the country had been defamed.

Be firm with Iran: Mofaz to U.S.

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Deputy Prime Minister Shaul Mofaz raised "strong concerns" last week during his meeting with senior U.S. officials in Washington over the administration's recent diplomatic overtures to Iran, which many believe is seeking nuclear weapons.

According to his spokesperson, Mofaz told U.S. leaders to be "firm" with Iran over its contentious nuclear program.

Israel voiced displeasure on Thursday at recent U.S. engagement with Iran and urged the Bush administration to stand firm on demanding Tehran abandon nuclear projects with bomb-making potential, an Israeli official said.

In a shift of policy, U.S. diplomat Wliam Burns joined envoys from other world powers for a July 19 meeting with an Iranian delegate at which his country was given two weeks to answer calls to curb uranium enrichment or face more sanctions.

The turnaround raised eyebrows in Israel, which has long looked to its U.S. ally to lead efforts to isolate Iran.

Since the multi-party talks in Geneva, Iran has said it would press ahead with its nuclear plans. Israel has increased the stakes in the diplomatic standoff by hinting it could resort to military strikes against its arch-foe's nuclear sites.

One of the more vocal Israeli hawks, Mofaz, was hosted by Burns on Thursday for routine bilateral consultations known as the "strategic dialogue."

Mofaz's spokesperson, Talia Somech, said he used the forum, as well as separate meetings with U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to raise Israel's objections to the direct U.S.-Iranian talks.

"It wasn't a matter of levelling outrage, but of voicing Israel's strong concerns," she said.

"He [Mofaz] urged the Americans to set firm conditions, such as a refusal to allow the Iranians to enrich uranium on their turf, and to be clear that the deadline must be preserved. The Iranians are simply looking for cracks to exploit."

The West accuses Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian program. Iran denies it and has stirred regional war jitters by vowing to retaliate for any attack by targeting Israel and U.S. assets in the Gulf.

The State Department issued a statement after the Mofaz-Burns meeting that said nothing about the possibility of using force against Iran.

"The United States and Israel share deep concern about Iran's nuclear program, and the two delegations discussed steps to strengthen diplomatic efforts and financial measures to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapons capability," the statement said.

It gave no details of the measures discussed.

"We also reaffirmed our strong mutual determination to counter Iran's support for terrorism," said the statement, which the State Department said was being issued by both the United States and Israel.

Israel, which is believed to have the Middle East's only atomic arsenal, says a nuclear-armed Iran could threaten its existence.

Mofaz, a former defence minister, is considered a possible successor to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who plans to quit after his party chooses a new leader in September.

Elaborating on a now standard Israeli call, Mofaz said during his Washington talks that "all options against Iran should not only be on table, but prepared," Somech said

Earlier in the week, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak told his U.S. counterpart that a military option should remain on the table when dealing with Iran.

Barak met with U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates and with Rice and Cheney

Israel prefers tougher sanctions, Barak told reporters after meeting with Gates, but "we should bear in mind that no option should be removed from the table, which he called the "formal" position of the United States.

"We should mean it when we say it," Barak added.

German firm closes deal with Iran

JTA

BERLIN — A German firm has closed a major deal with Iran to build three new liquid gas plants.

The deal, recently approved by the German government, reportedly is worth $156 million to the Siegen-based firm of SPG-Steiner-Prematecnic-Gastec.

SPG-Steiner will apply its high-tech method of turning gas into a sulphur-free liquid fuel, enabling the production of 10,000 barrels per day at each of three plants in southern Iran.

Germany's Federal Agency for Economics and Export Control examined the deal for a year before giving its approval, based on its determination that none of the construction elements could be put to military use and that the contract would not violate United Nations or European Union sanctions.

State loan guarantees are banned for deals with Iran, so step-by-step financing reportedly is planned.

Critics say the deal violates the spirit of the sanctions, if not the letter of the law.

Johannes Gerster, the head of the German-Israeli friendship society and a former member of parliament, told the Jerusalem Post the deal should be rescinded as incompatible with German Chancellor Angela Merkel's talk of tougher sanctions during her address to the Israeli Knesset in March.

Germany has reduced trade with Iran over the past year as part of international pressure on the Islamic Republic to stop enriching uranium.

Talks continue with Syria

A fourth round of indirect peace talks between Israel and Syria, mediated by Turkey, ended last week. A fifth round is due this month, a senior source close to the talks told Reuters. "The fourth round has ended. It was positive. The fifth round will be in mid-August, and again indirect," the senior source close to the talks told Reuters. The talks took place at an undisclosed location in Istanbul. The source said he expected a sixth round in September, but did not specify whether that round would be face to face.

Negotiations centre on the fate of the Golan Heights and Syria's relations with Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah.

Probing the Gaza pullout

A Knesset committee has approved a commission to study the handling of Israeli evacuees from the Gaza Strip since the 2005 withdrawal. The State Control Committee voted 9-3 to approve the commission of inquiry. State Control Committee Chairman Zevulun Orlev of the National Union-National Religious Party, said the commission was needed because "the government expelled 10,000 people from their homes and abandoned them." Meretz lawmaker Avshalom Vilan expressed concern that the establishment of such a commission would set a precedent for future evacuations. He called the vote in favor of the commission "cheap populism."

Probing the water crisis

A Knesset committee agreed to establish a state commission of inquiry into Israel's water crisis. The Knesset State Control Committee said it would set up the commission to investigate why the recommendations of professionals and government decisions were ignored. It will be charged as well with making recommendations for both the short and long term to ensure an adequate water supply. In July, Israel's main source of fresh water, the Sea of Galilee, reached its bottom red line, beyond which pumping water can cause irreversible damage. Experts have predicted it will reach its black line, beyond which pumping is impossible, by December.

Bibi wants vote now

A day after Ehud Olmert announced that he would not run for re-election, Benjamin Netanyahu called for new general elections. Netanyahu, the opposition leader of the right-wing Likud Party, took to the airwaves the morning after the Israeli prime minister announced he would resign when a new Kadima Party head was elected next month. He urged new elections as soon as possible. "This government has reached an end... it doesn't matter who heads Kadima. They are all partners in this government's total failure," Netanyahu told Israeli Radio. Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon, who is close to Olmert, has said he believes Olmert's successor will have a hard time forming a new government and that new elections are likely.

Will work for peace: Livni

Tzipi Livni said Israel will work to close a peace deal with the Palestinians this year, no matter who is prime minister. Israel's foreign minister, who spoke with reporters after a meeting in New York with UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, said internal politics would not change the country's agenda. "The fact that there are internal changes does not change the fact that a threat exists," said Livni, lead negotiator in talks with the Palestinians. She called on Israel's political parties to unite under the centrist Kadima Party to promote security and the peace process.

Olmert interrogated again

Police questioned Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last Friday at his Jerusalem home. It was the fourth interrogation in connection with an evolving graft investigation. The interrogation reportedly dealt mostly with Rishon Tours, Olmert's travel agency and less with the "cash envelopes" case involving American Morris Talansky. The questioning reportedly took place in a calm environment.

'We want to rebuild our old agriculture'

"We expect to be here for at least several more years," he said, standing behind the counter of his grocery store one morning recently.

If uncertainty plagues Dafna and other displaced persons in Nitzan, the reverse is true in Shomriya, where several hundred former Gaza settlers from Atzmona and Kfar Darom were resettled quite successfully.

Shomriya, next to the Lahav forest, close to the barren hills of the West Bank and north of the city of Be'er Sheva, was founded as a kibbutz by the left-wing Hashomer Hatzair movement in 1982. By 2005, with only a handful of families still left in Shomriya, it was mired in financial crisis.

As Shomriya imploded, Atzmona – which was home to a tight-knit community of 53 observant families that produced field crops, house plants, dairy products, cleaning fluids and processed kosher chickens and turkeys – teetered on the edge after Sharon's decision to disengage from Gaza.

David Raisch, who arrived in Gaza in 1986 and now lives in Shomriya as its manager, said that no one in Atzmona was psychologically prepared for the blow.

A graduate of Bar Ilan University and the Mercaz Harav seminary in Jerusalem, the flagship of the settler movement in the West Bank, he went to Gaza for nationalistic reasons and with the government's encouragement and blessing. "We wanted to build up our country. For us, Gaza was part of Israel. We thought it would be a big challenge to develop Gaza."

In Atzmona, where he became a prosperous exporter of peppers and bonsai trees, Raisch and his family had a wonderful and productive life. " I went to Gaza with three children and left with 11. We were building and creating. We were not colonists. We were returning to our ancestral land. "

He added, "I didn't go to Gush Katif for a better personal life. I did it for the Jewish people."

Claiming now that he never had faith in Sharon's previous promises to retain Gaza, he said, "I never believed in him. I wasn't one of his groupies."

Raisch and his fellow settlers passively accepted their fate as Atzmona became the last Gush Katif settlement to be evacuated. "We worked with the facts as we came to the last page," he recalled. "There was no violence. We coordinated the evacuation with the army. We went with dignity, but it was like walking into the unknown."

A week after they departed, the buildings in Atzmona, including Raisch's spacious cottage, were demolished. "Today, Atzmona is just sand," he lamented. "Hamas converted our school into a training camp."

Subsequently, the settlers lived in a tent city near Netivot as they worked out a compensation package with the government and plotted their next move.

"We had a meeting with Sharon's advisers," Raisch said. "We requested a site where we could resettle as fast as possible."

Before the Atzmona group descended on Shomriya two years ago, the families there affiliated with Shomer Hatzair left en masse. "Ideologically, we couldn't coexist," said Raisch.

It took 150 trucks to transfer the belongings and assets of the Atzmona group – 500,000 house plants and 800 cows – to Shomriya, whose infrastructure and water systems were built by the Jewish National Fund and whose day-care centre and synagogue were donated by two Toronto families, the Lewars and Koschitzkys, in co-operation with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada.

"We have no problems here, baruch HaShem, just challenges," said Raisch, who was born in Haifa. "We've never fought for the present but for the future."

The settlers appear to have adjusted to their new lives within Israel's borders remarkably well, and Raisch readily admitted that they are better off than most of the Jewish refugees from Gaza.

Few, if any, have been racked by trauma. "We help each other," said Raisch, who hopes to turn Shomriya into a regional centre. "We're a community, and we shlep each other up. We are committed to Am Yisrael whether we're up or down. We have good days and bad days, but we're survivors. We say, 'Just be up, never down.'"

Shomriya, populated by 700 observant Jews and 10 Thai workers who live on the edge of the kibbutz in cabins flying the multi-coloured Thai flag, sustains itself through a dairy herd, field crops, an olive orchard and a regional school for 400 students.

In the near future, Shomriya intends to build a 70-room guest house and a swimming pool.

To Raisch, Shomriya faces three broad challenges.

"We want to rebuild our old agriculture base and change the colour of the landscape from yellow to green, expand our population to 3,000 and find a way to live with our neighbours on Kibbutz Lahav, who raise pigs."

Although Raisch is happy in Shomriya, he would jump at the chance of returning to Gaza should it ever revert to Israeli control. "I'd love to go back," he said.

As he gazed at the brooding mountain range across the border, Raisch admitted he is far from certain whether Israel has the will to keep the West Bank.

But he is absolutely convinced that Israel has a rightful claim to it and the Palestinians are not entitled to statehood in the West Bank.

The Palestinians can exercise their right to sovereignty in Iraq or Kuwait, he said. "Israel belongs to only one nation, no question about it."

1948...They Were There

Scholar sought opportunity, found pride instead

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Eli Pfefferkorn joined the Machal (overseas volunteers in Israel's War of Independence) out of opportunism, not patriotism, he admits. Nevertheless, the Toronto scholar; retired teacher and Holocaust survivor says he is proud of the country he fought for in 1948.

"Holding a gun in my hand that replaced a shovel three years earlier gave me pride as a Jew, fighting my enemies who wanted to perpetrate another Holocaust," he told The CJN in a recent interview about his time in Israel just after its birth.

An opinionated man with a feisty spirit, Pfefferkorn refuses to divulge his precise age – he's in his 80s – insisting instead that he won't "let people wait for me to die... let them be surprised instead."

Pfefferkorn was born in Gdansk, Poland, and emerged from the war-torn country after surviving Majdanek and "five other camps" before being liberated from Theresienstadt and heading to England.

"One hundred and twenty-five teens came out from the camps, the woods," Pfefferkorn recalled of his survival, adding that he and some of the other orphaned teens went to London after their liberation to restart their lives and find their fortunes.

"We were launched into civilization right after the war," he said.

In England, Pfefferkorn and his friends became wards of the state, "and we soon had to decide what to do."

Pfefferkorn quickly determined to join the navy, where he hoped to get training as a radio operator and use those skills to advance his civilian career later on.

In short order, he realized that a heavily regimented military life was not for him and decided to try and find a way out "without losing face," he said.

In 1947, when Pfefferkorn was on a furlough during Passover, an emissary from the Yishuv (the settlements of pre-state Israel) came to give a talk to young Jews.

Pfefferkorn, "increasingly disenchanted" and sensing a chance to shed the weight of his maritime school, ended up enlisting with the Yishuv and made the trip to Israel with two of his friends, arriving just after Yom Ha'atzmaut, during the height of the War of Independence against the Arab armies.

He was assigned to the Givati brigade, which fought in the south against the Egyptian army.

Pfefferkorn said that contrary to what some "post-Zionist" literature has recorded, he couldn't believe how Israel initially seemed outclassed, at least in terms of materiel and personnel, by the Arabs.

"From what I saw and experienced, the first stage of the war was between an army and an underground. We were under-equipped, outnumbered," he said. "We won the first round strictly due to the Jewish genius of fighting. We attacked at night because the Egyptians couldn't use their tanks at night yet. Our only advantage was our determination not to lose."

Always the pragmatist, what he saw and experienced at first in Israel made him question his choice to leave England.

"It never occurred to me what an idiotic step I took to join [the fighting in Israel] after having survived two years in the concentration camps and the ghettos," Pfefferkorn said.

Toward the end of the war, his brigade was pulled out and sent to recuperate in Hadera. During this time, he and his friends were asked by their commanders to take part in a special mission to "find and guard the Jews responsible for murdering [UN mediator for Palestine, Count Folke Bernadotte]," he said.

(Bernadotte was assassinated in Jerusalem on Sept. 17, 1948, by members of the Lehi, freedom fighters of Israel, a right-wing military group.)

Pfefferkorn and his comrades refused and were sent to the military prison at Jalami, an old British outpost, for four months.

"It was heaven," Pfefferkorn laughed. "We had food and barracks. After being there, we put on weight."

Though Pfefferkorn used his stint at Jalami to while away the hours in relative luxury compared to what his comrades were experiencing on the battlefields, it finally dawned on him that he was losing valuable time and started feeling like a wastrel.

"We wanted to get back to England and finish our schooling," he said. With that in mind, he approached Jalami's commander about getting released to return to Europe.

Although the request was met with resistance and "ready made" slogans designed to appeal to a sense of Zionism and pride in "the rebuilding and the redemption" of the Jewish homeland, Pfefferkorn persisted and was eventually transferred to Tel Aviv to await further transfer back to England.

"My experience in Israel evoked pride in me," he said, calling its War of Independence a "response to the passivity" of previous generations of Jewish lay leadership who had "injected a passivity" into Diaspora Jewry that always saw the Jewish people sit idly by and "endure" whatever attacks came its way.

A controversial position, but Pfefferkorn said that sentiment merely underscored his generation's progressive desire to form a Jewish state after the horrific events of the World War II and to join with other young people in "aggressive" movements like the Yishuv to take back control of their own destinies.

Though he doesn't subscribe to a lot of the rhetoric employed by many Jewish leaders post-Shoah, he believes in Israel and what it represents to Jews worldwide.

"'Never again' is just a slogan," Pfefferkorn said. "But if it would happen again, it will be on Israel's terms. I don't think there's another people in the world whose state is threatened. I believe today, Israel is ready to respond to any situation. This gives me pride."

Pfefferkorn moved to North America in 1989 to "consult with Elie Wiesel on the creation" of the United States' Holocaust Memorial in Washington. An author and literary critic, he also taught at The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto until 2005.

He's putting the finishing touches on his memoirs, which he plans to publish shortly as a book, titled The Muselman at the Watercooler.

Legendary Israeli photographer shares stories behind images

By BRAM D. EISENTHAL
Special to The CJN

There's a special element to great photography. Surpassing the ability to capture great light, to frame the subject in uncanny fashion, there's prescience required to get that perfect shot.

What can you say, then, about a photographer who has captured the miracle of the rebirth of an entire Jewish nation and has chronicled the years and events through his lens ever since? David Rubinger is such an individual, that rare breed of photographer who with his camera aperture has allowed us to share in the miracle of that rebirth.

Now in his early 80s, Rubinger has this year had his memoirs published, featuring the revealing stories that go hand in hand with his most famous images. Israel Through My Lens: Sixty Years as a Photojournalist (Abbeville Press) begins with a foreword by Israeli President Shimon Peres, whose official portrait was taken by Rubinger.

"When David Rubinger looks back, he can be at one with himself – war and construction, nervousness and patience, the new and the sad, a rich tapestry of people, a cornucopia of personalities, a series of events: all follow one another to depict a unique chapter of history. No story can replace the incredible power of the pictures," Peres writes.

Rubinger's most telling sentiment on his work can be found in an e-mail exchange during the research for this article. "Am not much of a nature photographer," Rubinger wrote. "Human misery is more down my line." And, indeed, the book begins with a shocking anecdote dating back to 2004, when Rubinger celebrated his 80th birthday. "On Dec. 26 of that year, the very day the tsunami struck in Asia, I was confronted by my own personal tsunami," he reminisces. "It seemed impossible that any personal drama could reduce to insignificance the overwhelming tragedy in the Far East. Something did."

Rubinger's companion of two years (his longtime wife, Anni, died in 2000), Ziona, was due to meet him so the two could go swimming. As she didn't answer her phone that morning, Rubinger went to Ziona's home for a scheduled noontime lunch and his ringing the doorbell went unanswered. When her daughter-in-law arrived with a key, they found the woman inside, her throat slit, murdered by her gardener Muhammad, to whom she had refused to give a large sum of money he had demanded.

The intense media coverage that followed made Rubinger realize that he should probably report on his own series of incredible media moments, recorded with his camera's eye. In March 2005, he met with an old British friend, art consultant and curator Ruth Corman, who had organized a 1988 exhibition of his work that ran at Montreal's Saidye Bronfman Centre. Corman offered to write the book for him and he accepted, the two collaborating between Jerusalem and London via the Internet.

Another Canadian connection to this book is actually responsible for its creation. "[This] photo-bio began really in my living room in Jerusalem, when [Canadian philanthropist] Charles and [his wife] Andy Bronfman had come over for coffee," Rubinger says. "As we talked about various things, Andy suddenly exclaimed, 'But you must do an oral history!' And here it is... the result of Andy Bronfman's legendary enthusiasm."

Bronfman's wife would not live to see its publication, dying tragically and prematurely in New York in 2007. From the picture on the book's cover, of Israeli paratroopers looking up in hope and disbelief at the Western Wall, freshly liberated from Jordan on June 7, 1967, the book's images and text are truly a stunning diary of Israel to this day.

Rubinger covers it all – the War of Independence, the ingathering of the exiles, Sinai War, Six Day War, Yom Kippur War, the two intifadahs, his personal life (including a look at his work as a Time-Life stringer) and precious behind-the-scenes observations of politicians, including David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, Menachem Begin, Yitzhak Rabin, Teddy Kollek, Ariel Sharon, Ronald Reagan, Egyptian president Anwar Sadat and Austrian chancellor Bruno Kreisky, as well as the artist Marc Chagall, the popes John Paul VI and John Paul II and others.

Rubinger is no one's public relations flack, and he is refreshingly honest when necessary. For example, Meir was not always the kindly grandmother she is often portrayed as being, but Begin was the ideal statesman and "absolutely incorruptible," Rubinger says.

In the end, however, it is the camera that is the most honest witness of all. Rubinger has captured the quintessential soul of the Jewish nation with his.

David Rubinger with Ehud Olmert.

Ashkenaz features 200 performers from a dozen countries

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Eric Stein's serendipitous introduction to klezmer music turned out to be a life-altering event.

He was doing sound recording for his late brother, David Stein, a filmmaker, who was documenting the 1997 Toronto Ashkenaz Festival. At the time, Stein had completed an MA in history and was planning to stay on the academic career track.

While he was an accomplished musician – he played electric bass – klezmer music was quite foreign to him. He had little previous exposure to Yiddish culture and the music celebrated at the Ashkenaz Festival.

The experience of being immersed in what he discovered to be "really cool music" inspired Stein to learn to play klezmer mandolin. "I started making connections in that world." He ended up ditching academia and becoming a full-time klezmer musician.

Fast forward 11 years. Stein is now the artistic director of the 2008 Ashkenaz Festival, which runs from Aug. 26 to Sept. 1 at Harbourfront Centre.

"I've come full circle," he says in reference to this leadership position and that fateful weekend he spent at the Ashkenaz Festival back in 1997. "I owe how I got into klezmer to my brother."

That year, playing mandolin and getting into klezmer and folk music opened his eyes "to the possibility of making a living as a professional musician," Stein recalls.

Eric Stein

He is the founder and leader of Beyond the Pale, a popular klezmer/world fusion group marking its 10th anniversary this year. The group has performed across North America and Europe, and has released two award-winning CDs.

In the last few months, however, Stein has had less time to be a band leader, because he's been so focused on the upcoming festival, he says. "It's a great honour to be the artistic director. It's been great fun to be making the decisions."

He describes the 60 acts and 200 performers from a dozen countries, as an eclectic and diverse group that will include Canadian crowd-pleasers such as Theresa Tova, Michael Wex, and the Flying Bulgars.

Argentine Yiddish tango diva Zully Goldfarb; Konsonans Retro, a brass band from Ukraine; legendary mandolinist-clarinettist Andy Statman; and Jewish funk supergroup Abraham Inc. with Fred Wesley, David Krakauer and hip-hop artist Socalled are among the lineup of international headliners.

Jewish gospel superstar from Harlem, Joshua Nelson, will be teaming up with popular local musicians David Wall and Ken Whiteley, he says. "One of the things I enjoy about making the programming choices is that I can be somewhat of an alchemist in putting together artists who have not previously collaborated."

Stressing that Ashkenaz has always been an interdisciplinary festival that embraces film, theatre, dance, literature, craft and visual arts, Stein notes that the Ashkenaz Parade on Labour Day featuring music, dance, massive puppets and stilt-walkers, remains a festival tradition.

The visual arts exhibit will showcase the work of Polish painter Maciej Frankiewicz, 40, the gentile custodian of the Jewish cemetery in Starachowice, a town between Warsaw and Krakow. "Maciej is very interested in the Jewish past of Poland," Stein said. "He's lobbied the government for a museum of the Jews."

Stein compares the style of Frankiewicz's work to that of painter Marc Chagall. "It's imaginative, surreal and provocative."

And there's a family connection, as well. "Maciej comes from the same town as my zaide."

In fact, the Wierzbniker Society, his late grandfather's landsmanschaft, is supporting the exhibit.

> Parade remains a festival tradition

Stein says that while his career as a historian may have been derailed, klezmer music keeps him connected to the past. "When I got off the track of being a professor, I didn't feel that I was walking away from history.

"With klezmer, there's the merging of my love of music and history."

MOST EVENTS FREE AT SEVENTH ASHKENAZ FESTIVAL

Featuring more than 50 artists from a dozen countries, the seventh Ashkenaz Festival takes place Aug. 26 to Sept. 1 at Harbourfront Centre and various locations around Toronto. As in previous years, most events are free.

The program reads like a who's who of modern klezmer and Yiddish culture. The list includes Jewish funk supergroup Abraham Inc., Argentine Yiddish tango diva Zully Goldfarb, mandolinist-clarinetist Andy Statman, Jewish gospel singer Joshua Nelson and the Russian klezmer band Nayekhovichi. Pharaoh's Daughter and Flory Jagoda perform Sephardi music. The Canadian contingent includes Marilyn Lerner, Ken Whiteley and David Wall, Theresa Tova, Shtreiml, Beyond the Pale, Michael Wex, Allen Merovitz, Sisters of Sheynville and others.

Jewish gospel singer Joshua Nelson

As usual the Ashkenaz Parade is scheduled for Labour Day and features music, dance, massive puppets, stilt-walkers and Shadowland Theatre. The festival was founded in 1995 by David Buchbinder, Bruce Rosensweet and Dianne Wienrib. This year's festival is being run by a new management team consisting of executive director Karen Tisch and artistic director Eric Stein. For details, please phone 416-979-9901 or visit the website www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Names in the News: Pinchas Zukerman, music director of the National Arts Centre (NAC) Orchestra, thought he was going out to dinner with his wife, cellist Amanda Forsyth, and NAC president Peter Herrndorf and wife Eva Czigler. The Israeli-born Zukerman was told to dress up for a quick photo-taking session at the NAC before dinner. Instead, he walked into his surprise 60th birthday party, the result of months of secret planning.

A gathering of 60 friends, colleagues and loved ones greeted Zukerman with a loud "surprise!" followed by applause and the singing of Happy Birthday. Attendees included Russian businessman Maxim Viktorov, World Bank president Jim Wolfensohn, NAC board chair Julia Foster and Richard Li, CEO of the Hong Kong-based telecommunications firm PCCW. Zukerman was also honoured at the Canadian War Museum as Norman Barwin, president of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, poured some Israeli champagne at a reception.

The Jazzman aims to swing into Sundance

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

As a boy, film director and writer Josh Koffman remembers his grandfather playing late into the night in smoke-filled jazz clubs around Toronto and admiring the man's incredible musicianship and the respect he garnered because of it.

That's because his grandfather was Moe (Morris) Koffman, Canada's legendary jazz saxophonist, flutist, composer and arranger.

Over the past couple of months Koffman, 26, has been on a frenzied filming schedule, shooting his latest movie, The Jazzman, on sets across Toronto and editing scenes on the fly, in hopes of submitting it for the Sundance Film Festival's consideration by the mid-August deadline.

The Jazzman is Koffman's homage to his late grandfather – Moe died of cancer at age 72 in 2001– and makes use of modern-day Toronto as a backdrop for the story.

Koffman also wrote and produced the film in collaboration with the local production company Summer Pictures.

Initially conceived as a biographical film about his grandfather, Koffman decided against the idea and chose instead to produce a more mainstream, accessible vehicle using aspects of Moe's personality to inform the characters in The Jazzman.

"I thought about doing a 'life and times' piece about him, but I wanted to wrap a dramatic story around it," Koffman told The CJN on a break during filming in Toronto's Beach neighbourhood last month.

It's Koffman's biggest film venture to date, after producing a series of short films. Using his connections, and with the help of his brash personality, Koffman was able to cobble together a $1.2-million budget for The Jazzman and woo three big-name, Canadian-born actors to play the leads.

"I went up to rich people and asked them for money," Koffman quipped, when asked how this project came to be financed.

Hollywood up-and-comers Laura Vandervoort and Cory Sevier, both of whom are part of the successful Warner Brothers TV franchise Smallville, and veteran screen actor Michael Ironside lend instant credibility to a film that might have otherwise gone unnoticed.

At least, that's what Koffman hopes the folks at Sundance perceive.

Sevier plays John Kadly, the young jazz drummer trying to get out from under his father's intimidating and perfectionist shadow.

A drummer in his own right, Koffman said Sevier's character represents parts of himself and recalled playing music with his grandfather from time to time at family events.

"He was always all business," Koffman said. "Always the best musician in the room. He taught me to strive for perfection."

Ironside plays the father, Bernie, a Toronto jazz legend based on Moe, while Vandervoort plays Sara, the young Kadly's love interest and muse.

Though not overtly Jewish in tone, Koffman said some of the "feel" of the movie will have Jewish elements based on his memories of his grandfather "being into the Jewish holidays."

Aurally, the film will revolve around a soundtrack of swingin' tunes penned or performed by Moe during his 50-year, 30-album career, he said.

Moe was also the booking agent and house band leader at famed jazz venue George's Spaghetti House at Dundas and Sherbourne streets in Toronto until it shut its doors for good in 1994.

His most successful recording was his 1958 composition called Swinging Shepherd Blues, which helped established Moe's status as a premier jazz flutist. His 1969 composition Curried Soul is still used as the intro music for CBC Radio's As It Happens daily broadcast.

Koffman said he hopes his film makes it into Sundance so that audiences could appreciate the "struggle of the artist as a timeless theme" and bring the Toronto jazz scene to light in a way that "has never been shown before. To really showcase the jazz scene at its best, before it becomes totally forgotten."

Pianist Jordan Klapman to play at Seniors' Jubilee

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Jordan Klapman, who has some 40 years of piano-playing experience and 30 years of performances under his belt, is anticipating performing at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall.

He will be accompanying a jazz violinist and three vocalists at Chartwell's Seniors' Jubilee, at the hall from Aug. 13 to 15.

It has been a serendipitous career route for Klapman. He never thought the nine years of piano lessons starting at age eight would, 42 years later, lead to what he does for a living.

Growing up, Klapman was exposed to the music of artists such as George Gershwin, Irving Berlin, and Rodgers and Hammerstein by his parents.

"That's what we sang at home and in the car, and the kind of records we bought," he says. "The jazz and Big Band sounds were what I really grew up with."

When his grandfather gave him a bound copy of sheet music, his skills as an improviser and composer blossomed. A "fake book," the sheet music included the melodic lines and lyrics of classic songs, without the orchestration and harmony.

Jordan Klapman

"This was the turning point to allow me to become a jazz musician and taught me how to improvise. I figured out these songs and how to harmonize them," Klapman says. "This was the greatest thing my grandfather could have ever done for me professionally."

Still, after graduating from the University of Waterloo as a graphic designer, Klapman believed that his calling was in his field of study rather than music, something he just wanted to do for fun.

"But I just kept gravitating to piano and realized it was what I wanted to do the most, even more than illustration, which is how I supported myself when I graduated," he says.

Klapman got his start playing at a restaurant in Waterloo, Ont. "I just wanted to play piano jazz and old standards, and old Broadway. I just felt this affinity to it," he says.

A pivotal moment, he says, came when he spotted a poster for a cruise that had a jazz ensemble made up of musicians Klapman admired. On a lark, he submitted a tape to the cruise company and was hired to play at the piano bar on a Caribbean cruise for several weeks. He was 20 at the time and had a limited repertoire, so the NCL cruise lines' SS Norway hired him short-term.

But that didn't deter Klapman from pursuing music. In fact, it was the springboard for many tours and performances to come, and over the next 30 years, he developed a diverse repertoire that covers various genres. Besides jazz and Broadway tunes, he plays klezmer, country, rock and Motown.

Klapman has been involved with several recordings. He was the musical director of the Juno Award-nominated Yiddish folk-song album A Feygele Zingt.

He also produced the 2004 CD One Hundred Years of Waller, a tribute album celebrating the centenary of Fats Wallers' birth.

Klapman and clarinettist Mick Lewis released Shine, 13 cuts by veteran musicians, in 2006. Klapman played on the 2006 country CD One Kiss Closer to Heaven and on Shul Days, a Yiddish and swing album released by the Yiddish Swingtet in 2007.

At the Seniors' Jubilee, he accompanies jazz violinist Ed Vokurka; blues and jazz singer Chick Roberts; and jazz singers Denise Pelley and Sharon Smith. Attendees can also expect a solo performance on the stride piano from Klapman.

Currently, he's on the lecture circuit, giving a series of talks on Broadway's Jewish composers at venues such as the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and soon in Guelph, Ont.

He is developing a lecture series on the topic "Jews of Rock 'n' Roll," about New York City's Brill Building, the last tin-pan alley song factory, where pop songwriters such as Lieber and Stoller, Neil Sedaka and Carole King penned some of their greatest hits.

Brampton Jewish commune puts on play of Soviet children's commune

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Members of a Jewish, secular, socialist, summertime collective in Brampton, Ont., are preparing a theatre production recounting the story of a Soviet children's commune in the 1920s.

On Aug. 9 and 10, residents of Camp Naivelt – run by the United Jewish Peoples' Order since 1945 as a summer cottage rental area for families interested in Jewish folklore and arts – present Oy di velt vet vern yinger: a work-in-progress.

Ruth Howard, the camp's artistic director and a Naivelt member, told The CJN by e-mail that the presentation will be "a multi-arts exploration about the past, present and future of Naivelt, driven by recorded and live music and soundscape, with simultaneous installations using dance, song, visual arts, projections, audience interaction and sewing."

Much of the project is based on the memoirs of Manya Lipshitz's life in the Twelfth Children's Work Commune in Soviet Russia.

It will also reflect information based on the research of Ester Reiter and the memoirs of Avram Himelstein, and "other oral histories from the community," Howard wrote.

Lipshitz, whose husband Sam was the editor of the left-leaning Canadian Jewish Weekly, wrote about her experiences in her 1991 book, Time Remembered, "a rediscovery of her youthful writings in journals from a Russian commune in the early years of the Revolution," according to the website, AntiQbook.

The hour-long presentation will be open to the public and will have repeated performances throughout the weekend.

But Howard encourages visitors to "plan to come for longer and visit Naivelt and our cottage installations."

In July, 25 Naivelt children immersed themselves in a weeklong experiment, living life as children in the early days of the Russian Revolution to capture what it was like "to believe, despite great deprivations, that a new 'younger' world was possible, that Utopia was just around the corner and that you were part of making it happen," Howard added.

Canadian ambassador loves his posting in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

HERZLIYA PITUACH, Israel – Jon Allen, Canada's 17th resident ambassador to Israel, is floating on a cloud of bliss.

"I'm having a wonderful time," he said in an interview last month at his palatial rented residence just north of Tel Aviv.

"I've had a a number of interesting postings, but Israel ranks up there as the most fascinating in terms of the issues, the people, the culture, the travel. It has been a terrific learning experience."

He added, "There is never a dull moment in Israel. You always live in interesting times in Israel."

Allen – Canada's third Jewish envoy to Israel after Norman Spector (1992-1995) and David Berger (1995-1999) – replaced his predecessor, Donald Sinclair, in June 2006, about a month before the eruption of the Second Lebanon War.

It's his first ambassadorship.

Now 57, he is due to finish his three-year assignment next August, but he said he would be glad to stay longer, working to "further enhance" Canada's friendly relationship with Israel.

"I'm a lucky guy," he said after the official interview ended one recent Friday afternoon. "It's one of the best gigs."

A lawyer by training with a degree in international law from the University of London, Allen is the first Canadian Jewish ambassador to Israel to be recruited from the foreign service.

Prior to Israel, Allen, who was born and raised in Winnipeg, served in Ottawa, India, Mexico City and Washington, D.C., dealing with issues ranging from human rights to trade law.

Although he is not a Middle East specialist like Michael Bell, who was twice Canadian ambassador to Israel (1990-1992 and again from 1999 to 2003), he believes that his job as minister for political affairs in Canada's Washington embassy prepared him for his current position.

"The Mideast was a fairly significant part of that job, so I followed Israel and the Mideast quite closely," he explained.

And once he was here, he noted, it did not take him long "to get up to speed."

Jon Allen and wife Clara

Allen, whose sister has lived on Kibbutz Kfar Blum since the Six Day War and whose father was a strong Zionist, is not exactly a stranger to Israel. He visited in 1973 after his first year in university, he stopped in the Jewish state en route to a posting in India, and he returned yet again five years ago on a visit.

As ambassador, he is supported by a staff of 55, of whom 15 are professional diplomats. He went out of his way to praise the local Israeli employees, describing them as "the backbone" of the embassy.

On an average day, he arrives at his office in Tel Aviv relatively early by Canadian standards, between 7:30 a.m. and 8 a.m., so as to avoid heavy traffic.

He starts the morning by reading English-language newspapers (his Hebrew is less than impressive, despite having attended a cheder in Winnipeg) and perusing e-mails.

Then there are meetings with aides and Canadians passing through Israel. He has met Canadian cabinet ministers, politicians, business executives, academics, journalists, judges and Jewish community leaders.

Since Israel's capital is in Jerusalem, he travels there quite regularly to confer with Israeli officials and politicians.

He also visits Israeli universities, Israeli Arab communities and Jewish Canadian projects such as the Canada Centre in Metulla.

On a regular basis, Allen submits situational reports to Ottawa, always striving to convey information not likely to be found, say, in the New York Times.

His biggest challenge is keeping abreast of Israel's ever-changing political scene and its ramifications on the region.

He is not a one-man show. Allen's wife, Clara, the daughter of Polish Holocaust survivors, works with Ethiopian Jewish immigrants to ease their integration into Israeli society. Last month, in recognition of her achievements, she was the subject of a feature story on CBC TV's nightly newscast.

He is obviously proud of her. When the interview with The CJN ended, Allen called his wife, who was relaxing by the outdoor pool, and the couple posed for a photograph.

Their two sons live in Canada but visit on holidays and during the summer. One son is in third-year law at McGill University. The other is employed in health care in British Columbia.

Allen, whose grandparents immigrated to Canada from Russia, said that his father – a dentist who served in the Canadian army during World War II – became a Zionist after watching grisly newsreels about the Holocaust.

"He was a strong supporter of Israel and of the Hebrew University, the Weizmann Institute and the Technion. He must have been here 10 to 15 times, and loved coming here."

His sister, having inherited her father's zeal for Israel, has lived in Israel, on and off, for more than three decades. Currently, she is a masseuse at a posh resort in the Galilee. Some of her clients have been his colleagues, he chuckled.

Although he said he is not a Zionist himself, Allen considers himself "a very proud Canadian" who understands Israel's significance for Jews.

In accordance with guidelines delineated by an aide, he declined to answer questions on political topics such as the state of Canada's bilateral relations with Israel and the Arab-Israeli conflict. But otherwise, he spoke freely and easily.

He expressed surprise at Israel's level of economic development, its building boom and its high-tech sector. "It is rather amazing. The growth rate has been 3.5 per cent for the past few years."

Striking another positive note, he spoke glowingly of Israeli creativity, innovation, frankness, vitality and risk-taking. "There is not very much I don't like about Israel," he mused.

He does not, however, care for the driving habits of Israelis, whom he compared to Indians and Italians, and he said he is always taken aback when Israelis brazenly disregard queues for buses and at elevators.

Israel's landscapes enchant him – the Galilee in spring, Mitzpe Ramon, Masada, the green patches in the desert, the drive to Jerusalem in the early morning, the Mediterranean Sea.

On his off days, he enjoys visiting art galleries and museums, swimming, playing tennis and discovering Israel.

He likes Tel Aviv, particularly Rothschild Boulevard and Sheinkin Street. He speaks highly of Israel's restaurants, praising the quality of the seafood and waxing rhapsodically on the lowly fafafel.

Israel's temperate weather appeals to him. "I love every minute of it. I never complain about the heat. I can't get enough of it. It'll be hard to go back to Canada in the winter. I spent 23 winters in Winnipeg, so I don't miss the snow."

You can enjoy meals without meat

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Those of us who are meat and potatoes people wonder how we'll get through nine days without meat. Others are thrilled at the idea of not having to have meat meals during the nine days leading to Tisha b'Av, the period of mourning when some do not eat meat.

Several years ago, I went to a very elegant wedding at a hotel in Jerusalem. The kallah (bride) was a vegetarian so the seudah (festive meal) was dairy. It was the most extravagant, sumptuous buffet I've ever encountered. Everything you could imagine was on that buffet, yet there were some groans, especially from men, of "there's nothing to eat here."

If you're one of the meat and potatoes people, I hope these recipes will change your mind – at least a little – about meatless meals.

CHERRY LASAGNA

2 cans cherry pie filling
8 lasagna noodles, cooked
1 container ricotta cheese
3 eggs
1/4 cup sugar
1/3 cup all-purpose flour
1/3 cup plus 3 tbsp. firmly packed light brown sugar
1/4 cup quick-cooking oats
3 tbsp. butter, softened
1/2 teaspoon cinnamon
1/2 cup sour cream

Heat oven to 350. Coat a 9 x 13-in. pan with cooking spray. Spread one can of pie filling in the bottom of the dish. Layer four noodles evenly over the filling. In a medium bowl, combine the ricotta, eggs and sugar. Mix well. Spread over the noodles and top with the remaining four noodles. Top with remaining pie filling. In a small bowl, combine flour, 1/3 cup brown sugar, oats, butter and cinnamon until crumbly. Sprinkle over pie filling and bake for 40-45 minutes, or until heated through. Allow to cool for 15 minutes.

Meanwhile, in a medium bowl, combine the sour cream and the remaining three tablespoons of brown sugar; mix well. Drizzle over the top of the lasagna and serve warm. Serves 6-8.

STUFFED PIZZA TRIANGLES

1 package refrigerated pizza crust
1/2 cup pizza sauce
1/2 cup shredded mozzarella cheese (about 2 oz.)
1/4 cup ricotta cheese
1 egg yolk beaten with 1 tbsp. water

Preheat oven to 400. With rolling pin or hands, press pizza crust into 8 x 12-in. rectangle, then cut into 4 squares.

On greased baking sheet, arrange squares. Evenly spread sauce on each square, then top with cheeses, leaving 1/4-in. around edges. Fold top half over filling to form a triangle; seal edges with fork. Brush with egg yolk mixture. Bake 12 minutes or until crust is golden.

LAYERED TUNA AND PASTA SALAD

Serve this delicious salad in a glass bowl with straight sides to display all the colorful layers.

1 1/3 cups medium shell macaroni
4 cups shredded lettuce
1 cup chopped, seeded cucumber
1 cup chopped, seeded tomato
1 can chunk white tuna, drained and broken into chunks
1 cup frozen peas
1 can sliced ripe olives, drained
2 hard-cooked eggs, sliced
herb dressing (recipe follows)
1/2 cup finely shredded cheddar or other cheese
2 tbsp. sliced green onion

Cook pasta according to package directions, preferably al dente (firm to the bite). Drain; rinse with cold water and drain again. Place shredded lettuce in the bottom of a 3-qt. glass salad bowl with straight sides or other similar serving dish. Layer the remaining ingredients in the following order: Cooked pasta, cucumber, tomato, tuna, peas, olives and egg slices. Carefully spread the herb dressing evenly over top of salad, sealing to the edge of the bowl. Sprinkle with the cheese and green onion. Cover tightly with plastic wrap. Chill salad for 4 hours or overnight. At the table, toss layers lightly to mix. Makes 6 servings.

Herb Dressing

1/2 cup mayonnaise or salad dressing
1/3 cup plain yogurt
1/4 cup chopped flat-leaf parsley (Italian parsley) or 1 tbsp. dried
1 tbsp. snipped fresh chives, optional
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
freshly ground pepper to taste

Combine all ingredients in a small bowl and mix well. (makes 1 cup)

SUMMER DELIGHT PIZZA

A delicious way to take advantage of summer vegetables

1 large Italian flatbread or pizza crust
1 package goat cheese
4 medium tomatoes, garden ripe, seeded and chopped
1/4 cup chopped fresh basil leaves or 1 tsp. dried
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. fresh finely minced garlic
1 bell pepper, thinly sliced
1 medium red or white onion, thinly sliced
1/2 cup Calamata olives, or other flavourful olives, pitted and chopped
1/2 cup sun-dried tomatoes, soaked and sliced salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 425. Place flatbread or pizza crust on a baking sheet or pizza stone. Spread goat cheese on bread. Combine tomatoes, basil, olive oil and garlic; spread over goat cheese. Top with bell pepper, onion, olives, and sun-dried tomatoes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Bake for 15 to 20 minutes or until hot. Serves 4-6.

Levine enjoys memorable homecoming at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Former Canadian tennis player Jesse Levine may want to return to his country of birth more often, following his memorable debut at the recent Rogers Cup tournament, held at Rexall Centre.

Ranked 123rd prior to the tournament, 20-year-old Levine won three consecutive matches – two in a qualifying round – before almost upsetting Wimbledon champion Rafael Nadal. Along the way, Levine was buoyed by cheers from fans, eager to witness a victorious homecoming for the Ottawa-born player, who now resides in Boca Raton, Florida.

Levine went to school in Ottawa at Hillel Academy and took tennis lessons at the Ottawa Athletic Club. By age 13, he felt he could become a Canadian tennis star one day.

But then Levine's world changed after his younger brother was diagnosed with ulcerative colitis. The family was told he needed to move to a warmer climate to treat the illness. The Levines moved to Florida a few weeks following Jesse's bar mitzvah at Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa.

"I wasn't sure what to think. I knew we had to move for the sake of my brother, but knew I would miss my friends and family in Ottawa," said Levine.

The move to Florida was a blessing for young Jesse to grow as an aspiring tennis player. He honed his skills first at the Chris Evert Tennis Academy before moving to the Nick Bollettieri Tennis Academy in Bradenton in 2004.

By age 17, Levine was blossoming in tennis, winning the junior Wimbledon boys doubles championship in 2005 and earning a tennis scholarship at the University of Florida. After finishing his freshman year with a 24-1 record, Levine turned pro in 2007 and never looked back.

He has won a few tournaments this year in the Challenger circuit, but started to emerge as a major player at Wimbledon, winning qualifying round matches and finishing in the second round of the main draw.

But winning his matches with dramatic flair at the Rogers Cup made the experience unforgettable.

"I saw so many friends and family that I haven't seen in years and hearing them cheer for me in my matches is an experience I will never forget," said Levine.

Levine showed his ability to fight for every point in his four matches, opening with a 6-1, 6-7 (2), 6-3 win over Korean Woon Sun Jun, then rallying for his 6-3, 3-6, 7-6 (6) victory against German Benjamin Becker and a stunning defeat of Canadian Peter Polansky of Thornhill 6-2, 6-4 before losing in dramatic fashion to Nadal 6-4, 6-2 to finish in the round of 32.

"I felt my nerves a bit and did not execute as aggressively as I planned. Before the sixth game, I was in a zone, not sure of where I really was and then realized that I was playing the Wimbledon champion. I fought hard – as I had in all my other matches – but it was not enough against Nadal," said Levine.

"He (Levine) played aggressively and I was very impressed. He has a bright future and at 20, can only get better," said Nadal following the match.

Levine's victories at the Rogers Cup raised his world ranking to 106th, ensuring that he will be able to enter the main draw of most tournaments.

Canadians off to Beijing

Montreal freestyle wrestler David Zilberman will be joined on the Canadian Olympic team by Greco-Roman grappler Ari Taub of Calgary and baseball outfielder Adam Stern of London.

Taub, 37, was listed to go to the 1992 Games but lost his spot in a wrestle-off. He retired from the sport for eight years after being told he risked becoming a paraplegic because of bone spurs in his neck. He became a lawyer but returned to wrestling after learning he had been misdiagnosed.

In 2004 he won the Canadian title but was prevented from competing at the Olympics because he did not have enough international matches under his belt. Taub won a gold medal at the 2007 Commonwealth Wrestling Championships.

Stern, 28, was a Boston Red Sox prospect and played part of two seasons for the Bosox. In October 2006 he was traded to the Baltimore Orioles and spent two years in their system before being released in June 2008.

Israel sending 42 athletes to Beijing Olympics

JERUSALEM — Israel will send 42 athletes to the 2008 Summer Olympics in Beijing, its largest delegation ever. The Olympics begin on Aug. 8.

Veteran marksman Guy Starik was awarded an honorary place at the Games by the International Practical Shooting Confederation thanks to a remarkable achievement at the Grand Prix event in Munich recently where he scored a world-record 600 points. As a result, Starik will compete in his fourth Games.

High jumper Niki Palli was a late addition to the team after he cleared 2.27 metres at the Israeli Championships only two weeks ago. In prior competitions, Palli only managed to jump 2.10 metres, prompting Zvi Varshaviak, chair of the Israeli Olympic Committee, and Gili Lustig, the head of the government's Competitive Sport Unit, to say Palli's recent poor form "has got us rather worried." Palli earned a silver medal at the World Junior Championships in Beijing two years ago.

Other late additions to the team included kayaker Michael Kalganov (K-1 500 metres) and K-1 1000 metres) and Itay Magidi (3,000-metre hurdles). Magidi met the Olympic minimum at the recent Israeli Championships.

Other notables, who will compete in their third Olympics, include pole vaulter Alex Averbukh, judoka Ariel (Arik) Ze'evi and Kalganov, who will carry the Israeli flag at the opening ceremonies.

The Israeli team is almost equally divided among men and women, with 22 male athletes and 20 females. This is the 14th Games in which Israeli athletes will participate.

The IOC also announced the bonuses athletes can earn at the Games: for a personal best, athletes will be awarded NIS 10,000 ($2,995); for bout-based events (judo, taekwondo and fencing), athletes will be awarded NIS 3,000 ($900) for each stage they progress; and for those athletes who make it all the way to the final of their respective events, there are handsome bonuses, including a NIS 240,000 ($72,000) handout to any athlete coming home with a gold medal.

The land of milk and sunny

ALMOST FAMOUS

By Jacob Medjuck

I love power.

Clarification: I love energy.

In university, I studied engineering. On my first day, the faculty dean addressed us, saying, "You will study every facet of the combustion engine. You will apply it and bathe in its physics, but know that the engine is 50 years obsolete and the technology to replace it has existed nearly as long."

Our first class in science became a lecture in politics. The dean continued, "If efficiency in the car industry had improved at the same rate as in the computer world, then cars would fly, and travel a million miles per teaspoon of apple juice."

And he wasn't kidding. Computers evolved from vacuum tubes to transistors into silicon chips into quantum processors in mere decades. But transportation trotted from the horse and carriage into various incarnations of the combustion engine, and then stagnated.

University of Manchester professor Steve Furber has noted that computers are now 50 billion times more energy-efficient than 1949's pioneering Manchester Mark computer, which weighed roughly one ton and took up a whole room.

Blocking our advancement: the politics of oil dependency.

Since I bought my vehicle eight years ago, the price of gasoline has risen by almost 300 per cent. That's not inflation. That's insanity.

But with all sides on the brink, we have an opportunity to self-correct.

Fossil fuels feel like a complicated relationship, and nothing we should marry into. And the Earth isn't the fertile fossil-fuel fraulein she was in her youth. As she biologically ticks toward the five billion year mark, I think she wants us to fish or cut bait.

Nuclear power? Talk about unstable first dates. Toxic tanker-crude – that's real morning breath.

Why are we so attracted to complicated forms of energy? Let's admit to having had a sleazy one-century stand and move on.

And FYI: hybrid cars are Band-Aids because they're still oil dependent. Using them is akin to behaving like two ill-matched lovers who keep breaking up and getting back together out of habit. It's comforting, but not sustainable in the long run, although it could, in theory, bridge the gap until Mr. Right comes along.

So, after the dean's dirge, I quickly joined the solar car team. Our vehicle was sexy. It hummed across Australia with emission-free efficiency. However, it microwaved the driver.

Solar power in its infancy was also a failed relationship. Solar batteries were inefficient harvesters of the sun's raw power.

But consider this: the energy in the sunlight that reaches the earth in just 70 minutes is equivalent to our annual global energy consumption. The potential for solar power is virtually unlimited. Mr. Right may have a tan after all.

When I heard that by 2011, Israel will have completed building the largest solar energy plant outside of the United States, my interest in the sun was renewed.

I will forever be a proponent of hydrogen technology, but the Israelis are onto something: concentrated solar energy plants (CSPs).

Unlike solar batteries, which use semiconductors to convert sunlight directly into electricity, CSP plants use reflectors, like a magnifying glass, to focus sunlight on a fluid-filled vessel. The heat absorbed by the fluid generates steam, which drives a turbine to produce electricity. Power generation after sunset is still possible by storing excess heat in large, insulated tanks filled with molten salt.

Awesome.

Since CSP plants require high levels of direct solar radiation to operate efficiently, deserts make ideal locations.

The landmark Negev plant would also produce enough electricity to run the 100,000 electric cars that Project Better Place, a company focused on building an electric personal transportation system, is planning to put on Israeli roads by the end of 2010.

Fascinating – after 5,000 years, we're still emerging from the desert as pioneers.

Muscle doesn't make you big

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

I can't tell you how many times I hear, "I don't want to bulk up" or "get big" or "gain weight" – and oh yes, "I hate to sweat." Even worse, today's world promises you a smaller body in six weeks with little or no work, no matter what your age. So why would you work out?

I'm here to tell you the truth: the body builders you see in magazines or infomercials work really hard to get those perfect bodies. Bodybuilders work out strenuously for two hours a day, five times a week with very heavy weights. They also eat about 2,000 to 3,000 calories a day of healthy, high protein foods, which the average person never does.

We may eat 2,000 calories a day, but the combinations are usually wrong. Mostly this is not our fault, especially when we are marketed to so heavily by large food companies telling us what is healthy and what isn't.

In addition, you need to know that muscle uses fat as a fuel source for you to move. If you don't have muscle, then you are not burning fat. You are also not moving very fast. You are only using what we call usable calories, which come from the food we just ate that has not turned to fat.

I know this sounds fine, but here is the problem: the less you eat, the more fat you store, and the more you store, the less energy you have to move. Muscle allows your body to burn fat. Muscle also has less volume to it than fat, and therefore it moves more smoothly and with greater ease.

Most people want an easy answer when they try to lose weight, but there isn't one. Losing weight takes work, commitment and determination. Make the decision: call a trainer, grab some weights and move them for 30 minutes one day, alternating with a cardio workout the next day – meaning you move for 30 minutes without weights.

One of the many reasons we slow down as we age is that we lack muscle mass. Fat slows the body down from the inside, so get moving and put on the muscle.

Volunteer shammas helps the veterans at Sunnybrook

Sunnybrook volunteer Hilda Harris receives an award from Veterans Affairs Minister Greg Thompson.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Hilda Harris, who may well be the only female shammas in Canada, is a bundle of energy with an infectious smile.

Harris is the volunteer shammas (Yiddish for sexton) at the Jewish chapel at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

She recently received a prestigious award from Veterans Affairs Minister Greg Thompson, cited for her "exemplary contributions by generously giving of herself and so both benefiting veterans and making manifest the principle that Canada's obligation to all who have served in the cause of Peace and Freedom must not be forgotten."

Harris works hard to help meet the diverse need of the Jewish residents of the veterans facilities and their families, and to assist others in the hospital who reach out to her.

Whether she is greeting new residents to discuss their special needs and make arrangements accordingly, organizing Shabbat and holiday services, visiting bed-ridden patients, arranging programs for the residents' spouses or serving refreshments, Harris is on call to provide leadership and hands-on assistance.

Born in 1926 in Cardiff, Wales, Hilda Freedman tried to enlist in the WRENS, the women's navy, during World War II, but she failed the medical examination. She moved to London, England, to work for military outfitters.

In 1945, she married Eric Harris, who had served in the British Army. They moved to Canada in 1948, where Eric worked as a baker. He has been a resident of K Wing at Sunnybrook since 1994.

Harris was a volunteer at the Baycrest Centre for 25 years, and after her husband moved to Sunnybrook, she began to volunteer through the Red Cross at Sunnybrook.

Speaking of her volunteer schedule, she says, "I am here every day but Wednesday. I need a day for myself. I often meet the wives of the veterans for lunch."

Harris exudes love and caring. "I've arranged two brisses, a baby naming, bar and bat mitzvahs, a Jewish wedding and other family events for the residents.

"I get pleasure from seeing that things get done for the veterans. They gave us a lot. This is their home and we want to make it cheery and as pleasant as possible."

Her husband is unable to speak or walk. "What's the use of being miserable?" she asks. "It doesn't help anyone. We all have our aches and pains, and there is always someone worse off."

Dr. Leon Goldenberg, a veteran and a retired pediatrician who has been a resident of Sunnybrook's L Wing for six months, says "Hilda Harris is one of a kind. She's there for everyone. She is into everything and helpful in every way possible."

A brochure at the hospital notes that "the hospital considers Mrs. Harris to be one of the most valued volunteers at Sunnybrook, where she donates her time and services almost every day."

She sums up her philosophy this way: "I was always taught it is better to give than to receive. So I give what I can."

An immigrant to Israel from Ethiopia and his child are reunited with their family. As the aliyah from Ethiopia comes to an end, such scenes will also come to an end. [Paul Lungen file photo]

Has the end arrived for Ethiopian aliyah?

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — When the plane from Ethiopia touched down on Aug. 5 at Ben-Gurion International Airport with 65 new immigrants aboard, there was no ceremony to mark what constituted the end of a major phase of mass Ethiopian aliyah.

Instead, the immigrants were escorted through the old airport terminal, processed and bused to Jewish Agency-run absorption centres across the country.

They were the last of more than 17,000 to come to Israel since the Israeli government decided in 2003 to allow in a limited number of additional Ethiopians known as Falash Mora.

It was a far cry from the last time Israel completed a major phase of Ethiopian aliyah, in June 1998. Back then, prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was on hand to welcome the immigrants, promising them a bus tour of Jerusalem and declaring mass Ethiopian immigration to Israel officially over.

Last week's more subdued reception owed, in part, to the controversial aftermath of that ceremony.

Just weeks after Netanyahu's declaration, more than 8,000 additional Ethiopians turned up at Jewish aid compounds in Ethiopia petitioning that they, too, be taken to Israel. In the decade since, tens of thousands of Ethiopians have come to Israel, in large part due to the efforts of advocates in Israel and the United States.

Even before last week's milestone arrived, the closing of this phase of Ethiopian immigration – many thought it would constitute the end of mass Ethiopian aliyah – carried echoes of 1998.

Jews rescued from fighting in Georgia

By GRANT SLATER
JTA

MOSCOW — More than 200 Jewish residents have fled fighting near the Georgian border, most of them from a city where Russian bombers destroyed several apartment blocks last Saturday, according to the Jewish Agency.

The agency made contact with and co-ordinated efforts to evacuate Jewish families in Gori, a town famous as the birthplace of Soviet leader Josef Stalin, which borders the breakaway South Ossetia region.

Several dozen Jews in Gori decided to remain behind and protect their property, but most of the women and children left with other displaced Georgians for the capital, Tbilisi.

The Jewish Agency has sent extra staff to its Tbilisi mission and has set up a special hotline in Israel, as well as situation rooms in Tbilisi and Jerusalem, to handle requests for information from Georgian Jews living in Israel concerning relatives living in Georgia.

As of Sunday evening, eight Jews had arrived in Israel from Georgia, and as of Monday morning, 200 Georgian Jews had applied to make aliyah, a Jewish Agency spokesperson said.

Jewish Agency chairman Zeev Bielski said Monday that Israel's "immigration and absorption department in Jerusalem is gearing up in tandem to beef up, as may be needed and as developments warrant, the staff of the [Jewish Agency] mission in Tbilisi with additional emissaries and workers from the other countries of the [former Soviet Union]."

Bielski said that the immigration department "is prepared to provide all necessary assistance, including the accelerated handling of those who want to examine the options for aliyah to Israel… [and it] has begun preparing absorption plans in Israel that will prove conducive to immigrants from Georgia."

EU tightens sanctions on Iran

The News in Brief

Cotler Chairs March

MONTREAL — Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler was named one of six honorary co-chairs of the International March of the Living Advisory Board, the board said last week. The five other new co-chairs are Israeli basketball legend Tal Brody; Danny Ayalon, Israel's former ambassador to the United States; Daniel Kurtzer, former U.S. ambassador to Israel; Lord Grenville Janner of England; and Jennifer Laszlo-Mizrahi, founder of the Israel Project.

WORLD

BBI Head Meets Prez

BUENOS AIRES — The Ottawa-based president of B'nai Brith International said he had a "fruitful" meeting with Argentine President Cristina Kirchner on Aug 6. Moishe Smith said the Argentine government is pursuing justice in the 1994 terror bombing of the Buenos Aires AMIA Jewish centre, especially by seeking the arrest of Iranian suspects through Interpol. Smith and Kirchner discussed the high profile given to anti-Semitism in Argentina. Smith was in Argentina to attend a forum on anti-Semitism organized by B'nai Brith in Argentina and the Argentine Council for International Relations.

Payments Negotiated

BUDAPEST — Budapest Holocaust survivors are eligible for German compensation. Germany agreed to release $19 million in one-time payments to some 6,500 Jewish survivors of the Nazi occupation of the Hungarian capital, the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany said Aug. 5 in Budapest. To be eligible, survivors must live in eastern Europe and can't have received payment from other funds. A one-time payment of $3,000 will be made through the Budapest Fund of the Claims Conference, which will contact 6,000 survivors whom it believes may be eligible. Others must contact its Budapest office by Aug. 9, 2009.

Gas Deal Criticized

BERLIN — German Chancellor Angela Merkel criticized a major gas deal between a German firm and Iran. A government spokesperson said Aug. 5 that Merkel expects more tact from German firms regarding trade with Iran. Germany's Federal Agency for Economics and Export Control recently approved a deal worth $156 million (US) to Steiner-Prematechnik-Gastec, which will turn gas into liquid fuel at three plants in Iran. Though the deal is legal under laws that ban certain dealings with Iran, the firm ought to feel a "moral duty" to forfeit it, given "sensitive conditions regarding trade with Iran," the spokesperson said. Israel's ambassador to Germany has asked Merkel to cancel the deal.

Child Labour Alleged

POSTVILLE, Iowa — In what could result in the first charges against upper management at Agriprocessors, the Iowa Labor Commissioner's Office sent dozens of alleged child labour violations to the state's attorney general for prosecution. Completing a months-long investigation of the largest U.S. kosher meat producer, the commissioner found 57 alleged child labour violations, the office announced Aug. 5. The commissioner's referral came as the Postville, Iowa, company continues to try to restore its production capacity and revive its image after a May 12 immigration raid that was the largest of its kind in U.S. history. It also came just days after a group of 25 Orthodox rabbis visiting Postville on a trip paid for by Agriprocessors gave the firm a clean bill of health.

Museum Seeks Funds

WARSAW — The museum at the Auschwitz death camp is warning that its historic buildings will collapse without funding from world governments. The Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum in Poland is hoping that the European Union will foot some of the $100 million (US) needed to restore deteriorating structures, including wooden barracks, as well as create new facilities for tour groups and storage. Its director blamed an ongoing "bureaucratic standoff" for the problem.

Arbour Gets Mixed Review As Rights Chief

NEW YORK — A United Nations watchdog gave mixed reviews to the former UN human rights commissioner.

UN Watch's review of Louise Arbour's 2004-08 term says her critics and defenders alike tended to hyperbole.

For example, U.S. Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican, once called Arbour, a former Canadian Supreme Court justice, a "disgrace" and said, "While genocide rages in Darfur and political dissidents are tortured in Iran, she chooses to spend her time condemning democracies and defending tyrants."

But a study of Arbour's statements – reflecting her only power, to expose abuses through criticism – showed her to be a consistent critic of Sudan and its abuses in Darfur, and an occasional critic of Iran, UN Watch reported.

Arbour chose not to stay for a second term in part because of criticism from Ros-Lehtinen and the U.S. State Department that she tended to criticize the United States and Israel at the expense of real abusers.

On the other hand, claims by her defenders that she challenged abusers great and small also were unfounded, UN Watch said. Citing Amnesty International's praise of Arbour as "unflinching," it noted that she criticized China only once, never criticized Russia and ignored other abuser states, including Algeria, Belarus and North Korea.

UN Watch was critical of Arbour's stated approach of pressing some nations privately and others more directly.

Arbour, who stepped down in June, will be replaced by Navanethem Pillay, a South African judge.

Ohr Menachem Academy closes its doors

Preschool to remain open

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ohr Menachem Academy, which has served mainly children from the GTA's Russian Jewish community, will not re-open this September.

Its day care/preschool, which has 100 children between the ages of 2 and 5, will remain open.

The school's board made the decision Aug. 3, said Edward Kholodenko, president of Ohr Menachem's board of trustees.

Parents were called the next day, and separate meetings were held that day with staff and parents.

A combination of factors led to the decision, Kholodenko said in a joint interview with Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, senior rabbi of the Jewish Russian Community Centre and founder of the 11-year-old school.

They included declining enrolment, a growing deficit, and a lack of financial support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (formerly the Board of Jewish Education, now informally called the Mercaz).

Although the school informed the federation last year that it couldn't continue the way it was for long, the board members' "serious discussion" about closing the school began only a week before they reached a unanimous decision, said Kholodenko.

"It was very difficult," he added. "We tried everything we could to avoid it."

Most Jewish day schools have a deficit, noted Rabbi Zaltzman, a Moscow native who left Russia in 1971 as a teenager and has been in Toronto since 1980 as a Chabad Lubavitch shaliach to the Russian community.

He said that at other schools, fundraising makes up the shortfall, and also, in some cases, the Mercaz pays approximately half of tuition subsidies.

Pathology of grievance worship

From the editor's desk

The scenes last week of Palestinians killing Palestinians in Gaza were no longer surprising. They were a milder reprise of the scenes of the blood-drenched brutality of the Hamas putsch against Fatah some 14 months ago.

The violence was explained by Hamas as an attempt to root out the individuals responsible for a car-bombing the previous week in which five people were killed. It was, in other words, a settling of scores, in itself a reprise of sorts of the intra-Palestinian, indeed intra-Arab, history that has characterized the region for countless generations.

Not surprising either were the scenes of Israel coming to the aid of the bludgeoned Palestinians. Approximately 180 Fatah supporters, including 22 injured men, sought and were granted sanctuary from the fighting in Israel.

After urgent discussions between the Palestinian Authority and the government of Israel, the disarmed Fatah fighters were sent to Ramallah or to Jericho or to hospital for medical treatment.

Some will undoubtedly return to Gaza under the direction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' authority once it is safe for them to do so.

The rescue of Abbas' supporters was simply the most publicly visible of the constant, ongoing humanitarian acts extended by Israel to the suffering Palestinians who pay in personal penury and collective misery for their leaders' declared preference for terror and violence over tolerance and statecraft.

It is generally not my habit to comment on the media coverage of the conflict between Israel and its neighbours. Our astute and superbly knowledgeable columnist Paul Michaels, the director of communication of the Canada-Israel Committee, does that for the paper. His skill and ability in this field are incomparable.

Indeed in this issue of The Canadian Jewish News, Michaels pulls together for our readers some of the more salient aspects of the media's coverage of the intra-Palestinian fighting in Gaza last week.

He specifically calls attention to a column written by Rami Khouri, the editor-at-large of Beirut's Daily Star and the director of the Issam Fares Institute for Public Policy and International Affairs at the American University of Beirut, that appeared in the Globe and Mail on Aug. 6.

Michaels insightfully points out the biased, anti-Israel sting in Khouri's column as well as, quite interestingly and instructively, the selective editing by the Globe's editor of what appeared to be Khouri's original column.

Using Michaels' column as a jumping-off point, I call readers' attention to another element of Khouri's anti-Israel polemic. In particular, I point to the following statement by Khouri:

"This latest [round of Palestinians fighting with each other] being the most troubling example of how a once grand and noble Palestinian national liberation movement has degenerated into ineptitude"(my emphasis).

Where at all in the recent reaches of time and history is there any evidence of a "grand and noble Palestinian national liberation movement"?

If Khouri is referring to the days prior to the establishment of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), he can only be referring to the days when leadership of the Arabs in what was called after World War I Mandatory Palestine (it should be noted that the Jews of Palestine were the Palestinians for most of the world media until May 1948) devolved to a number of clan heads among whom were the notorious Mufti of Jerusalem and the chieftains of the Nashashibis, Husseinis and Kaukjis, to name only a few of the competing family clans that vied for territorial control in the area. As history records and as Khouri himself suggests, the clans fought one another before and as much as they fought the Jews. Moreover, at every possible turn, up to and even after the armistice following the creation of the State of Israel, this diverse group of Palestinian nationalists rejected any form of compromise and co-existence with the Jews.

If, on the other hand, Khouri is referring to the PLO, it is noteworthy to point out that the PLO was founded in 1964. Ahmad Shukairy was its first leader. In 1964, it should be noted, the West Bank and Gaza, too, were not under the Jewish state's control. The PLO could have immediately organized independence or some form of self-rule in those areas had it wanted to and, more to the point, had Jordan and Egypt respectively wanted to.

After a brief time, Shukairy gave way to the noted humanitarian, benevolent, and democracy-loving, freedom-fighter Yasser Arafat. Arafat gave the world airplane hijackings, the massacre of schoolchildren at Ma'alot, a gun and holster at the rostrum of the United Nations General Assembly (in 1974), corruption, cronyism, the theft of billions of dollars earmarked for the Palestinians, prevarication and open deceit to world leaders, suicide bombings in the second intifadah and perhaps the coup de grace for his suffering people, the rejection of a peace treaty with Israel at Camp David in 2000. This, of course, is only a partial inventory of Arafat's achievements on behalf of his people.

If this is what Khouri meant, we can only weep longer and with deeper sadness for a culture that so obsessively and perpetually worships grievance to the point of pathology and calls it noble and grand. We must weep, too, for the possibility of peace between Palestinians and Israelis.

A KING-SIZED PHILANTHROPIST

The 16th of Av (Aug. 17) marks the 123rd yahrzeit of Sir Moses Montefiore, one of the great Jewish visionaries and most respected philanthropists of the 19th century. Born in Leghorn, (Livorno), Italy, in 1784, Montefiore was raised in London, England, where he became one of the city's and country's most respected businessmen. At 6 feet, 3 inches tall, he cut an imposing figure and was welcomed throughout the courts of Europe. He retired from business in 1824 to devote himself entirely to community and civic affairs, chief among which was his love of Eretz Yisrael.

Montefiore tried to help the Jews of Eretz Yisrael become self sufficient. He underwrote the acquisition of a printing press, the building of a textile factory and the famous Montefiore windmill (inset), which can be seen today in Jerusalem's Yemin Moshe neighbourhood (named after Montefiore) near Mishkenot Sha'ananim. The windmill has never worked due to the lack of sufficient wind. Montefiore also campaigned on behalf of oppressed Jews in Russia, Morocco and Romania.

Sderot, El Salvador teens relax at Camp Gesher

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Lunchtime's almost over at Camp Gesher and several teenagers from Sderot, who were shy and quiet only moments before, begin to bang on the table while listening happily to other campers singing Love Potion No. 9.

A girl smiles and sways, making eye contact with a counsellor for the first time since lunch started. And suddenly they are different kids, laughing, banging on the table and playing clapping games with fellow campers.

Suddenly Sderot is far away, and it's almost time for a boat ride.

These teenagers from Sderot, along with four girls from El Salvador, were brought to Camp Gesher this year by Yaldeinu, an organization that is dedicated to preserving Judaic values through formal and informal education, with help from the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem.

"There are communities out there, unlike North America… that aren't being supported and are in serious need of resources and financial aid for Jewish education," said Michael Ettedgui, founder of Yaldeinu.

It's because of this need that Yaldeinu helped send nine kids, aged 14 to 18, to Camp Gesher this summer.

Camp, to the teens from Sderot, is a distraction from almost daily missile attacks in their hometown.

To the girls from El Salvador, who are part of a small Jewish minority with only one synagogue for the entire community, it is a chance to connect with their religion.

In El Salvador "people just don't know Jews. It's such an insignificant minority that Judaism is very foreign," Ettedgui said. "It's important for [Jews in El Salvador] to understand other communities and have personal relationships with Jews from around the world. They will learn that they're part of a people."

Ettedgui chose to work with Camp Gesher partly because of its status as a Zionist, non-profit camp. Located three hours from Toronto in Cloyne, Ont., the camp offers Jewish educational programming.

Along with water activities, drama, and arts and crafts, campers learn about Israel and social justice in terms of Judaism through planned activities and discussion groups.

Andrea Stanley, one of the teens from El Salvador, is enjoying the mix of Jewish education and socializing

"I've been here a week and I'm really liking it," Stanley, 15, said. "I get to meet different people, play different games and activities. The Jewish education [here] is good. It's a little more different. They make learning how to be Jewish fun. There's always a lesson behind every game."

For the teens from El Salvador, most of whom speak fluent English, the transition to Camp Gesher has been smooth. For the Israelis from Sderot, the process has been a little more difficult.

"The Spanish kids don't come from a war zone. They know nothing will happen to their families in three weeks," Ettedgui said.

The campers from Sderot "have all lived in a city that's sustained over 8,000 rocket attacks and have lived with all of the trauma that comes with that," Ettedgui said.

"The parents are happy their children are in Canada, while the children are concerned about their families back home. They want to have fun, but they can't get those thoughts of fear out of their minds."

While the campers from Sderot are dealing with homesickness, they're also beginning to get comfortable at camp.

Camp director Shaul Zobary has high hopes for these teens.

"A week from now it'll be a different picture – they won't want to leave camp. They went fishing. They enjoy it very much," he said.

"The thing is, they have a hard time communicating. Counsellors bring them into discussions. We have a lot of counsellors that speak Hebrew, which makes it easier. I think [the teens are] going to completely change."

Apart from helping Jews from Sderot and El Salvador, Ettedgui would like to help Canadians connect with other Jewish communities.

Through such contact, Canadians would learn a great deal about Jewish life, he said. "It will put a face to the news reports regarding the situation in Sderot. It will reinforce their love for Israel, it's got to."

Yaldeinu, which is less than a year old, also donates money to Jewish day schools in places such as Latin America. Ettedgui hopes to create followup programs for the international campers and to eventually expand the program to different camps.

Shia masters now in control, farewell Lebanon

Little noticed last week in the miasmic gusts of hot air by the western media leading up to the Beijing Olympics was a statement by the government of Lebanon that essentially cedes control of that country's foreign and military policy – and thus its sovereignty – to Hezbollah and its rabidly anti-Israel, anti-western leader Hassan Nasrallah.

"Lebanon, its people, its army and its resistance forces [read: Hezbollah] have the right to liberate or get back the Shebaa Farms, the hills of Kfar Shuba and the Lebanese part of the village of Ghajar, and to defend Lebanon against any aggression and protect its water rights – by all possible legal means."

The statement was approved unanimously by the cabinet.

A last-gasp attempt by the Lebanese parliament to rescue the country's independence from the theocratic clutches of the Shia radicals, by adding the limiting phrase "all under the auspices of the government," was defeated.

It matters not at all that the area known as the Shebaa Farms is not Lebanese territory. What matters is the right of unilateral movement and decision-making that the loaded language has conferred upon Hezbollah.

And worse.

The specious cabinet document has now become the pretext for aggression and possibly renewed war against the Jewish state at the choosing and instigation of the decision-makers in Iran to whom the excitable Nasrallah is accountable.

In complete violation of UN Security Council Resolution 1701 that ended the Second Lebanon War, Hezbollah has now rearmed. It is said to have some 40,000 missiles and rockets in its possession, far more than it had two years ago. In addition, Syria recently delivered to Nasrallah's army an SA-8 anti-aircraft missile system, which observers speculate will soon be used to challenge Israeli reconnaissance flights.

It is no consolation to the government in Jerusalem that last week's announcement enables it to hold Beirut fully accountable for the violence and murderous mischief that is being planned by Hezbollah.

Some two years after the Second Lebanon War, the takeover of that unlucky country by the Hezbollah-Iran-Syria triumvirate seems to be complete. But, as every observer knows, the sides of the triangle are not equal.

Iran is the long, ambitious, powerful, ideological, financial and military side of this three-sided asymmetry of terror. It can now claim as its first dark and grisly achievement, alas, the takeover of Lebanon.

West be warned. Israel be ready.

25 years ago in The CJN

A resolution adopted by the sixth assembly of the World Council of Churches in Vancouver identified Israel as the main source of tension in the Middle East. Observers Rabbi Jordan Pearlson and Rabbi Marc Tanenbaum called the final document a great improvement over the draft resolution, an outcome they attributed to Jewish input.

Editorial Advisory Board: Guy Aboodi, Michael Brown, Donald Carr, Gal Corfas, Igor Korenzvit, Keith Landy, Rabbi John Moscowitz, Lou Ronson, Alan Sandler, Rabbi Philip Scheim, Mike Shriqui, Pamela Medjuck Stein, Ehud Telem, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, Nelson Wiseman.

Israel, Hezbollah prisoner swap

In freeing the loathsome Arab terrorist Samir Kuntar (and others) in exchange for the bodies of our two martyred soldiers, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, the Israeli government has set the country on a bloody course – more and more kidnappings and killings of its soldiers and civilians, followed by more and more such criminal exchanges ("Israel, Hezbollah reach prisoner swap," CJN, July 3).

I read the words "justice," "mitzvah," "obligation," and "compassion" in connection with this event, an event that has contaminated the sacrifice of these two young martyrs by forever linking their deaths with this scandalous act of their government and its aftermath.

What about directing those admirable concerns to Jonathan Pollard, a Jew who also risked his life in the service of Israel and has paid for his sacrifice with 23 years in an American prison, and has been betrayed and abandoned by Israel? Where is the compassion, the cry for justice and moral outrage over this monumental injustice?

How can we, especially since the Holocaust, and especially since the establishment of the State of Israel, go about our daily lives when such a blatant miscarriage of justice continues to poison the Jewish world. What value is served by a community that says Yizkor for Ehud and Eldad and ignores its moral obligation to rescue the living Jonathan?

Survivors' directory

The Canadian Guide to Programs and Services for Holocaust Survivors is timely, informative, instructive and esthetic to boot ("Survivors' service directory published," CJN, July 31). Most importantly, it will save the health-stricken elderly survivors from running around knocking on unresponsive doors.

The question, however, is whether the listed institutions in the directory will be able to meet the inevitably growing survivors' requests following the directory's publication. It would, therefore, be useful to follow up on this commendable effort with a view to finding out whether or not it achieves its intended goal.

Perhaps this booklet will also inspire the Claims Conference to take out a page in the directory and at last reveal the sums of monies kept in Swiss banks' vaults, in investments, and the intake of the rented properties in eastern Germany.

Jews for Judaism has worldwide impact

I am concerned that your readers may have gotten the impression that Jews for Judaism offers only "three or four lecture series per year, attracting a couple of dozen people at a time" ("Jews for Judaism counters growing missionary movement," CJN, Aug. 7). This does apply to our counter-missionary survival seminar, but it's just the tip of the Jews for Judaism iceberg.

With the help of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and thousands of generous donors from across Canada, in 2007 alone, Jews for Judaism's Canadian branch provided a remarkable 13,340 direct client services that included 1,898 counselling sessions on missionary, cult and intermarriage issues; 2,729 requests for help, information or referrals, and 8,614 participants in 159 educational programs at 84 different venues. In addition, we distributed more than 85,000 items of literature, books or audio materials free of charge.

With six international branches of Jews for Judaism, we are having a tremendous impact worldwide and have been an enormous deterrent to the effectiveness of missionaries and cults by preventing countless Jews from falling into their clutches.

1948... They were there

I have been enjoying The CJN series "1948... They were there," about the Machalniks. We should be very proud of the young people who sacrificed for our great country of Israel.

However, there were others who also fought so we could have a free Israel.

In 1945, as a 17-year-old survivor of the Holocaust, I was recruited through Betar to the Irgun. For three years, I and many other young men helped survivors get to Israel. Unfortunately, some of the boats were diverted to Cyprus by the British, but many made it through. I feel proud that we also contributed to the growth of the Jewish population and to its defence.

Is Canada's Jewish community shrinking?

By LEO DAVIDS

Earlier this year, Statistics Canada released more results from the 2006 Census of Canada. Among the data that elicited much interest in Jewish circles were figures on ethnic origin or ancestry.

In 2006, the question about religion was not included, leaving us with the 2001 numbers for people who report their religion as Judaism. Thus, anyone interested in monitoring the numbers for the Jewish population had to examine the origin or ancestry statistics where the response was "Jewish" and compare this to earlier census responses about religion to see the trend, if any, that appears in regard to the numbers of Jews in Canada in the various census years.

As a front page article in The Canadian Jewish News indicated when the 2006 counts became available, many people were shocked at the small number of Canadians who reported their ethnic ancestry to be Jewish, even with the addition of those people who gave no other origin to the respondents who reported multiple ancestry, one of which was "Jewish."

We must review the relevant numbers from 1991 and 2001 to help clarify the issue involved in interpreting the 2006 census. We might also be able to project some observations to the 2011 census. But the statistical picture has to be sketched first. [See table below]

In 1991, Canada had just over 318,000 Judaists, i.e. Jews by religion, who were concentrated in Greater Toronto and Greater Montreal. That had been the case for a long time. In the same year, Canada had just under 370,000 ethnic Jews, of whom close to 246,000 reported no other ethnic origin. Almost 124,000 respondents on the census claimed mixed ancestry that included Jewish. Therefore, the 1991 census found the total ethnic Jewish population (combining single response with multiple response) to number tens of thousands more than the count of Judaists (Jews by religion) that year.

A clear majority of our ethnic Jews were solely Jewish, reporting no other ethnic ancestry. Those of multiple ancestry were about half as numerous as the single-response Jews at that time.

Going forward to 2001, one could spot some interesting dynamics in the numbers.

The number of Judaists had risen 3.7 per cent to 330,000 for the entire country, while the count for ethnic Jews declined by almost six per cent. The ethnic total in 2001 was 348,600, but the "ingredients" were different than a decade earlier.

In 2001, the sole Jewish background count had shrunk by 24 per cent, while the multiple response total had risen by 32 per cent. Although the single response group was still larger than the multiple response group, the gap between them had become much smaller. It was also evident that counting ethnic Jews gave one a very different picture than that of the religion count. The number of Judaists had risen, while the ethnic Jewish totals had shrunk.

If one had to pick which count of Jews to believe, most of us would no doubt give more credibility to the denominational measure (by religion) than to the historical one (ethnic or ancestry).

Arriving at our most recent census, in 2006, we have no religion data, because that question was not asked. In 2011, scholars will have new counts of Canada's Judaists to consider, and I would guess that the total then will be a little higher than it was in 2001, but it's unlikely to reach 350,000 Judaists (Jewish by religion).

Leo Davids

This is not the place to discuss the cumulative effect of late marriage, low fertility and out-marriage statistics, but those demographic realities are continuing to affect the Canadian Jewish population. It is, therefore, unlikely that there will be much increase in our total at that time. Immigration of Jews to Canada is also a small factor in the growth of the Jewish community these days.

Turning to the ethnic Jewish counts in 2006, we see continuing shrinkage of the single-response population but some growth among the number of Jews of multiple origins. The national total for single-response Jews (no other ancestry reported) has fallen to 134,000. The multiple response group slightly exceeded 181,000. The combined total of all Canadian Jews by ethnicity had declined close to 10 per cent in only five years from 2001 to 2006 with a significant loss of 28 per cent in the single response category.

This seems to indicate a crisis of Jewish identity and a dramatic loss in the number of Jews. It also suggests a possible threat of further rapid decline in the number of Jews in Canada.

But is that really what the census results indicate? Let's consider the following.

Judaists (Jews by religion)	318,050	330,000	n.a.
Single Response Ethnic Jews	245,850	186,500	134,050
Multiple Response Ethnic Jews	123,750	162,100	181,075
Total Ethnic Jews (single and multiple)	369,600	348,600	315,125
Shrinkage of Total Ethnic Jews		-5.7%	-9.6%

Firstly, the scholarly literature makes it clear that the ethnic origin question is unclear and produces unreliable answers. While some respondents actually give a true report of their ancestry, many others interpret the question to mean only current ethnic identity, which may or may not correspond to past historical realities.

This makes ethnic origin data somewhat suspect and lends little credibility to analyses that try to follow ethnic origin counts over a long period of time. Thus, the rapid fall in Jewish numbers that appeared in the latest census may not mean a rapid fall in the numbers at all.

For example, the decline may indicate a shift in people's consciousness about their ancestry corresponding to their connectedness or lack thereof to the current Jewish community. This would represent an educational-cultural challenge, but not necessarily an emigration of Jews from Canada or any other strong demographic move affecting the actual count of Jews in this country.

Secondly, one should note that many Canadians choose to report their ethnic origins as simply "Canadian." While this reply was not available in earlier censuses, it's now available as a choice in response to the ethnic question. Nearly one-third of all census respondents choose this answer rather than reporting specific origins such as Scottish, Italian, or Jewish.

That being the case, many who would have reported Jewish ancestry some years ago may not have bothered to do so in 2006. Rather, they may have joined millions of their fellow citizens in reporting themselves as ethnically "Canadian."

Thirdly, the concept of Jewish ancestry is irrelevant in Canada. Whereas membership in an aboriginal group or visible minority has considerable legal and other meaning in terms of multicultural policies and legislative entitlements, membership in European background will not. Thus, Jews in Canada have little motivation to report accurately regarding the ancestry variable, unlike others who still face discrimination in respect to public services.

Fourthly, the notion of ethnicity tends to shift or fade with the passing generations. Individuals in ethnic groups who immigrated to Canada recently usually have a stronger ethnic identity and are less likely to claim to be of mixed ancestry.

However, groups that have been in Canada for a century or more are less attuned to their pre-Canadian history and are increasingly marrying across ethnic and religious lines. Reporting their ancestry is more difficult and is likely to be given less attention on the census form.

Although some of the Jews of Canada arrived after the Holocaust, the majority have been in this country for several generations. Thus, many respondents who are not currently involved with synagogue life or the organized Jewish community might tend to have a weaker Jewish consciousness and little interest in responding accurately to the relevant census question about their ethnicity. Therefore, these ethnic counts might not mean very much in regard to Jews, whereas they would be far more meaningful in regard to groups more recently arrived in Canada, say within the past two decades.

We need also to consider Jewish history as a contributor to the formerly strong and salient Jewish identity that was visible on earlier Canadian censuses.

Prior to the Holocaust, a large portion of the world's Jewish population was concentrated in eastern Europe – Poland, Russia, Ukraine, Lithuania, Latvia, and so on. Until fairly recent times, Jewish distinctiveness in that part of the world played a significant role in the everyday lives of most eastern European Jews. Every Jew was powerfully, if not automatically, connected to other Jews, but not necessarily to the larger non-Jewish society of the country in which they lived. Whether Jews held citizenship in these countries or not, as history has shown, they were not always considered to be full members of their respective societies by the non-Jewish majority.

In Canada today, however, those former European realities do not exist.

Judaism is indeed a different religion from the other faiths around us, but Jews can choose to be fully integrated into Canadian society.

We parent in English, except for a very few who use other languages at home. We date our letters and contracts according to the same calendar as everyone else. Our basic activities, whether at work or at leisure, are the same as most of our other fellow Canadians who have been here for a long time.

Since our chief values and perspectives are generally identical with those of other Canadians, how Jewish do many of our youth feel today? Despite good work by our day school teachers, rabbis, Jewish journalists and so on, many Jews whose grandparents were born in Canada no longer feel compelled in any way to report Jewish ethnicity on a census form. The everyday reality of eastern European Jews that so strengthened their self-consciousness as Jews, whether religious or secular, has been transformed into a very different everyday, psycho-cultural environment in Canada in which it is easy to forget completely about ancestry and origins. Indeed, some among our Jewish youth do seem to have forgotten about Torah and the shtetls of their ancestors. They appear not to feel Jewish at all.

It's this great shift in typical consciousness or identity among Canadian Jews that accounts for the steep drop on the ethnic origin counts in the recent census. It's not an actual disappearance of Jews.

As the Jewish by religion counts indicated, the number of Judaists increased between 1991 and 2001 while the number of Jewish by ethnicity shrunk.

There's no need to panic.

Our educational and cultural challenges are real and must be confronted. But there is very little reason to think that the actual Jewish population of Canada is becoming smaller today. This will no doubt be demonstrated when we have the figures from the 2011 census.

The number of single-response ethnic Jews is likely to disappear in future census reporting, but the Jewish community is holding its own.

Opinions

Defending identity

Discussing the concept of identity can easily waft from clarity to frustrating incongruity. It's helpful, therefore, that in his new book, Defending Identity, former Israeli cabinet minister and onetime refusenik Natan Sharansky offers a definition at the outset that sets the tone for what follows.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

First and foremost, he concedes that identity doesn't readily lend itself to any single, or easy, description. "One universal quality of identity," Sharansky says, "is that it gives life meaning beyond life itself" and "offers a connection to a world beyond the self." He continues: "This can happen by associating with others who share similar backgrounds or religious affiliations, by connecting with previous generations or by being part of a nation or culture."

In the book's early chapters, Sharansky draws on his experiences as a prisoner in the former Soviet Union, which is when he first discovered his Jewish identity and the inspiration that it evoked. He refers to Marxism as the first attack on identity and then reflects on "late 20th-century post-identity theory," which he regards as the second great assault.

"This theory," according to his interpretation, "comes in a variety of forms, from post-nationalism, which envisions a global society, to post-modernism, which sees each identity as unstable and all cultural forms as morally equivalent, to multiculturalism, which regards society as lacking any centre but comprised of groups with equal claims and authority."

What the post-identity proponents seem mostly to agree on is that there is one absolute evil: war. What follows is the "logical" affirmation that if identity (manifested as nationalism or the preservation of the nation-state) causes war, and war is evil, then identity causes evil.

When moving from the general to the particular, with this construct as a backdrop, it's easy to predict where Sharansky will go in the latter part of his book, when he begins to focus on Jewish-Israeli identities. To Muslim extremists, Israel is a hostile identity, while in the view of post-nationalists, Israel remains a colonial identity. Either way, Israel's very existence is regarded as anathema.

But the nefarious aspirations of anti-Zionists and their fellow travellers – cloaked as they are within the parody of modernism, globalism and pacifism – is not what this book is all about. On the contrary, one of Sharansky's objectives is to craft a framework for defending (especially Jewish) identity, and he does this admirably.

By providing fresh insights on the connivance, political correctness, and moral and cultural relativism that are so pervasive in media discourse on the Arab-Israeli conflict, and by formulating his responses to such hypocrisy within the context of defending identity, he offers his readers an effective strategy for dismantling narratives that seek to demonize Israel and Jews.

Change in fence route would reduce terror

Since the beginning of 2008, 12 Israelis have been killed in acts of terror in Jerusalem, all committed by Arab residents of the city. According to the Shin Bet's official website, 270 east Jerusalemites were arrested for terror-related activities from 2001 to 2007. In the first six months of 2008 alone, 71 such offenders have already been detained.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

The day after the latest "tractor" terrorist attack, I happened to take a cab ride with an Arab driver from the eastern part of the city. I asked what he thought of the recent spate of terrorist acts, and his remarks gave me food for thought.

He seemed genuinely saddened by the latest incidents, but he was less concerned that they would precipitate travel restrictions for Arab residents of the city. When I asked if he feared that these might include changes in the security fence's route so as to exclude neighbourhoods in east Jerusalem, his response was insightful. While none of the latest attackers seemed officially linked to terror groups, he conjectured that they had all committed their acts hoping that Israel's reaction would be just such a change in the barrier's route.

"You Israelis never stop talking about an eternally united Jerusalem," he said. "A route change leaving the city's Arab areas 'outside' the fence would prove that premise a myth."

After the Six Day War, Israel re-defined Jerusalem's municipal boundaries, annexing part of the territory that was previously the Jordanian municipality of Jerusalem, as well as adjacent villages in the West Bank. At the time, there were 68,300 residents in that area, accounting for 26 per cent of the city's population.

According to the Jerusalem Institute of Israel Studies (JIIS), in 2006, 254,400 Arabs lived in the city. That's 34.4 per cent of the populace, and JIIS forecasts continued Arab growth in the city at double the Jewish rate. By 2020, 40 per cent of the city will be Arab.

Arab east Jerusalemites weren't given Israeli citizenship in 1967, but rather permanent residency status. They can vote in municipal elections, but not national ones. Israeli residency also means that they're entitled to the same health and social welfare benefits as Israeli citizens. It also gives them complete freedom of movement within Israel. This freedom has created a security problem.

The fence has improved security, but it has also encouraged many east Jerusalemites to return to the city. Its existing route already excludes areas within the city's municipal boundaries, including Kafr Aqeb, Walejeh and the Shuafat refugee camp. JIIS notes that while statistics are hard to collect, testimony makes it clear that many Arabs who had re-located to Palestinian suburbs of the city have returned. They've done so because of the hassles they encounter entering the city at security crossing points and their fear of losing Israeli residency, with all its attendant benefits.

Since the latest east Jerusalem-based terror acts, various ideas have re-emerged as to how to deter potential perpetrators. Some suggest demolishing terrorists' homes or expelling their families to Palestinian territory. Others propose annulling their Israeli residency status, thus negating their right to state-funded social benefits.

Another proposal – seemingly more congruent with my cab driver's ideas – calls for re-routing the security barrier so that more east Jerusalem neighbourhoods would be on its "Palestinian" side. Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon is the major proponent of this argument within the government. He argues that leaving these neighbourhoods on the "Israeli" side is tantamount to accepting continued terror originating from them. In his view, it's in Israel's best interests to be rid of some of these areas, which were never really part of Jerusalem and whose inhabitants endanger the essence of the city as the country's Jewish and Zionist capital.

Ramon is right. Making route changes to exclude more Arab neighborhoods has nothing to do with a "united Jerusalem." That issue deserves a separate discussion. The areas to be excluded are peripheral and were never really part of the city.

The change will be expensive. Each kilometre of fence costs eight to ten million shekels. And we'll have to ensure that innocent residents of these areas are not too adversely affected by the change. Legal challenges to the route's modification will also have to be overcome. But it's a necessary step toward enhancing security, and it might also eventually alleviate Jerusalem's demographic problem.

Did the world learn anything from Durban?

On April 20, 2009, the Durban Review Conference is scheduled to open in the United Nations building in Geneva. In the original UN anti-racism conference, held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, the ostensible objective of opposing racism was transformed into the embodiment of racism and hatred directed at Israel and the Jewish people. The question now is what lessons, if any, have been learned from this experience?

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For the leaders of this process – including Libya, Iran, Egypt, and Algeria – the objective is to repeat their achievements in 2001. They will again have help from many of the more than 1,500 non-governmental organizations (NGOs) whose representatives adopted a final declaration that included labels such as "apartheid" and racism, and called for boycotts and international isolation.

To prevent this, some governments – led by Canada's, with the support of the Liberal opposition – have declared they will not attend another anti-Semitic conference. And 96 NGOs, led by the Magenta Foundation (based in Holland) and the Jacob Blaustein Institute for the Advancement of Human Rights (in New York), signed a mild pledge "to reject hatred and incitement in all its forms, including anti-Semitism… and to work together in a spirit of mutual respect."

But this is a relatively small percentage of the NGO network, and the superpowers – Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International – that were part of the Durban fiasco have refused to add their names to the document.

Interestingly, the New Israel Fund has signed, and if its funding policies were consistent with these words, this would be significant. However, this is not yet the case, and a number of very powerful and prominent NGOs that receive the NIF's largesse, such Adalah and Mossawa, are continuing to implement the Durban strategy through false human rights allegations and by attacking Israel's legitimacy as a Jewish homeland.

In funding these hostile groups, NIF officials claim to be supporting (from the outside) Israeli democracy, but the damage far outweighs any benefits. Other political organizations supported by the NIF – such as Bimkom, Yesh Din, and Machsom Watch – attack the security measures that save Israeli lives. For example, the separate roads built to prevent Palestinian terrorists from using their vehicles as weapons are condemned as "apartheid." But the recent attacks in Jerusalem in which terrorists used tractors demonstrate the necessity for separation, and this has nothing in common with the real apartheid that was practised in South Africa. Unless the NIF changes it policies, funds from its donors will be used for similar attacks at the Durban Review Conference.

In contrast, the Ford Foundation, which has an annual budget of more than $500 million, which it distributes to hundreds of NGOs, has announced a change in policy after an investigation by the U.S. Congress regarding Durban funding. Officials established guidelines to prevent a repetition of Durban, but these guidelines are not always enforced, and the tens of millions of dollars provided by the Ford Foundation to the NIF is an indirect means to a similar outcome. The Ford Foundation should be encouraged to do more to avoid funding anti-Israel political warfare.

Government aid programs are also a major source of funding for the radical NGOs involved in Durban. In Canada, Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity, announced that aid money can't be used for the 2009 conference, and the United States has enacted similar restrictions.

But European governments, which provide support for dozens of groups, have taken no such action. In the May meeting of the preparatory committee for the review conference, European representatives silently approved accreditation for the Palestinian Grassroots Anti-Apartheid Wall Campaign, paving the way for a repetition of the 2001 fiasco. In the same committee, Iran blocked the application of the Canadian Council on Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) in part because its name includes the word "Israel." The contrast between the treatment of CIJA and the Palestinian NGO demonstrates the double standards that dominate the entire process – which also hasn't changed since 2001.

When Canada announced that it would not to take part in 2009, critics said this was premature. The critics, including in the NDP, have been proven wrong, and anyone participating in this conference will simply be giving it legitimacy. The time has come for democratic leaders and responsible NGOs to act with moral clarity.

The Kirshner File

2006 war in Lebanon was not Israel's finest hour

The Second Lebanon War wound down exactly two years ago this week as a United Nations truce went into effect on Aug. 14. It was a war that neither side wanted and it was a war that cost Israel and Lebanon dearly. It started with a Hezbollah ambush and ended with a belated Israeli ground offensive and a hail of Arab rockets hitting Israeli towns and kibbutzim in the Galilee. The events that led to the month-long war are clear. On July 12, 2006, Hezbollah attacked two Israeli army vehicles inside Israel, killing three soldiers, wounding two and kidnapping two reservists, Udi Goldwasser and Eldad Regev. In a failed rescue attempt, five more Israeli troops were killed. By way of retaliation, Israel bombed Lebanon and imposed an air and naval blockade. Hezbollah responded by firing the first of some 4,000 missiles at Israel, starkly exposing its vulnerability on the home front.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As we already know, the war was not a resounding success for Israel. The Israeli Air Force performed brilliantly, but the army did not. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert acted decisively in reacting to Hezbollah's aggression, but from that point onward, he dithered, creating a sense of drift.

Two Israeli journalists, Amos Harel and Avi Issacharoff, both on the staff of the daily Ha'aretz, have written a tough-minded post-mortem of the war. Their hard-hitting book, 34 Days, Israel, Hezbollah and the War in Lebanon (Palgrave Macmillan), is a blistering critique of Israel's performance on the military and political levels.

Before they plunge into their analysis, they double back to discuss the events that preceded it. They agree that Ehud Barak, the then-Israeli prime minister, was right in assuming that violent incidents would decrease after Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon in May 2000. But Israel's pullout, they observe, prompted Hezbollah to establish a vast military infrastructure in southern Lebanon, all with the assistance of Syria and Iran. On the eve of the war, Hezbollah had deployed upward of 20,000 rockets in a 10-kilometre-wide strip north of the Israeli border. In keeping with Hezbollah's tactics, most of the missiles were hidden in private homes.

"The [Israeli] army was caught unprepared for war in the north," the authors persuasively argue. Israel was focused on crushing the second Palestinian uprising, and in general, the best commanders were assigned to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip rather than to Lebanon. And because the Lebanese border was not considered a priority, the army's presence there was reduced to a minimum. In addition, training schedules had been curtailed and units dismantled. More to the point, the Israel Defence Forces had last conducted a conventional war in 1982, when Lebanon was invaded.

Harel and Issacharoff speculate that Israeli raids into Gaza to increase pressure on Hamas to free the abducted soldier Gilad Schalit – who still remains in captivity – may have been the cause for Hezbollah's ambush on July 12. They believe that it was most probably planned by Imad Mugniyah, who was assassinated in Damascus last winter.

Hezbollah is also the object of criticism. Although the authors describe its secretary general, Hassan Nasrallah, as shrewd and charismatic, they point out that he was taken aback by Israel's fierce reprisals, and that his closest adviser expected the situation to quiet down within 48 hours. Olmert, too, miscalculated, assuming that Hezbollah would sue for peace after a few days.

Israel's then-chief of staff, Gen. Dan Halutz, called for a harsh response, and in this respect, he was supported by the neophyte defence minister, Amir Peretz. However, the head of the operations branch, Gen. Gadi Eisenkott, advised a cooling-off period before action was taken.

Israel bombed Lebanon nevertheless, knowing full well that there were not enough bomb shelters in the Galilee. "It is doubtful whether Israel ever went to war in so slapdash a fashion," the authors write, adding that cabinet ministers approved the bombing campaign without seriously discussing the implications. "Only later did they realize that the IDF had no plans for defeating Hezbollah or countering short-range Katyusha fire," they further note.

Harel and Issacharoff claim that Halutz had an ambivalent attitude toward a ground offensive and was not completely frank with his generals about his intentions. They go on to say that "cardinal decisions" were made by Olmert and Halutz in very brief consultations, and that Peretz made only "a token contribution." Continuing in that vein, the authors say that Olmert was "too hasty" and that he "entered the war impulsively, with the government trailing behind him."

The option of a ground offensive was placed before Olmert at the start of the war by the director of the Mossad, Meir Dagan. But Olmert and his associates listened to Halutz, who advised them to rely on the air force while utilizing the army for limited assignments.

An Israeli soldier in Lebanon covers his ear to the thunder of artillery fire.

Harel and Issacharoff claim that Israel was offered a ceasefire between July 16 and 18 under which Goldwasser and Regev might have been handed over to the Lebanese government. But they say that Israel declined, saying the captured soldiers no longer topped its agenda.

The turning point in Israeli public opinion vis-a-vis the war occurred on Aug. 6, when a Katyusha killed 12 reservists bivouacked in Kibbutz Kfar Giladi. "The fact that all the casualties were reservists… had an immense impact on public morale," they say.

According to Harel and Issacharoff, there were "glaring deficiencies in basic soldiering" on the Israeli side. The infantry did not co-ordinate with armoured divisions. Tank crews were unskilled in night manoeuvres. They contend that Israel's most impressive military action was in destroying 59 stationary Fajr rocket launchers, concealed in the homes of Hezbollah activists and Shiite families in southern Lebanon.

In an appraisal of Hezbollah's fighting abilities, they say that it rarely tried to defend a fixed site, because territory was of no consequence to Hezbollah. "On the whole, Hezbollah did not seek face-to-face encounters with the IDF." Hezbollah's aim was to survive, make Israel bleed and inflict the greatest possible number of casualties.

But having said that, Harel and Issacharoff praise the combat readiness of Hezbollah guerrillas who remained on the field in the face of Israel's offensive. Israel was surprised by Hezbollah's zeal, determination, command of forward units and relatively high level of military intelligence. In short, by hammering Israel's home front and withstanding an Israeli counter-attack, Hezbollah succeeded where Arab countries had failed, they note.

"For Israel, the war was not the defeat that the political opposition tried to make it out to be," they add. "But it was a stinging failure – both because of the enormous discrepancy between Israel's expectations at the beginning and the way in which it ended."

On the last day of the war, Hezbollah, far from having been crushed by a superior Israeli force, fired a peak number of rockets, about 250, into Israel. For Israel, at best, the war was inconclusive.

In summing up, Harel and Issacharoff say that the war exposed Israel's weaknesses in key areas. Olmert, Peretz and Halutz lacked the necessary capabilities for leading the country to war. The Israeli army paid a high price for drastic cuts in training budgets, and "a disturbing sloppiness revealed itself… at all the main stations of the command chain."

Two years after the last gun fell silent, Hezbollah is stronger than ever and Israel seems to have absorbed the lessons of the war. But militarily, the Second Lebanon War was hardly Israel's finest hour.

Israel not blamed in coverage of intra-Palestinian torture

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian news media recently covered accusations by Human Rights Watch and other non-government organizations that rival Palestinian factions Fatah and Hamas routinely torture their prisoners.

What was especially noteworthy in the coverage was the absence of any mention of Israel or reference to "the occupation." The media remained focused on internal Palestinian affairs.

In a July 29 report for CBC's The National, Peter Armstrong interviewed Palestinian human rights activist Shawan Jabarin of Al Haq, a group based in the West Bank.

Armstrong said: "Jabarin's organization has released a report documenting with photographs what he calls 'systemic abuse' by both sides. The report says at least four men… died while being held by rival factions."

Armstrong also interviewed Joe Stark of Human Rights Watch, who said: "Underlying this, in my view, really the root problem is a pattern of impunity. Nobody's held accountable for this."

Armstrong concluded: "In fact, there's every indication the abuse continues. After a bombing in Gaza left six dead last week, Hamas rounded up some 200 Fatah supporters. Dozens of Hamas supporters were then arrested in the West Bank. Ominous signs, according to human rights workers. The cycle is showing no sign of letting up."

On Aug. 6, the Toronto Star ran "Hamas, Fatah hurt the Palestinian cause," an edited version of an editorial from the Daily Star in Beirut, which retained all the essential points of the original.

The editorial reflected on a recent clash in Gaza, in which 150 members of Fatah sought refuge in Israel.

As the editorial put it: "It is a damning indication of just how bad things have become in the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip when Fatah militants must look to Israel for protection from their Palestinian rivals."

The Daily Star decried the absence of effective Palestinian governance: "Achievement of the Palestinian cause requires that all factions maintain a semblance of orderliness and keep their eyes on the prize of independent statehood. In this both Fatah and Hamas have been miserable failures. Both have put partisan interests ahead of national ones and therefore have failed to maintain anything like a united Palestinian front."

It concluded: "We have seen Palestinians denigrating the legitimacy of other Palestinians, Palestinians making war on other Palestinians, and Palestinians arresting other Palestinians, while the Jewish state has come to the rescue of those Palestinians who fear for their lives.

"Israel has never looked so good."

For an Arab newspaper to write such words is surely a noteworthy development, one the Toronto Star clearly recognized.

Also on Aug. 6, the Globe and Mail reprinted a column by Rami Khouri, the Daily Star's editor-at-large, under the headline, "Palestinians' self-inflicted wounds."

However, Khouri was far less generous toward Israel: "Ordinary people understand that the Palestinians fight against a Zionist foe whose predatory territorial aims are anchored in the ugly soil of 19th-century European imperialism and colonialism."

What's more: "Israeli oppression has also helped fracture Palestinian society and turn some of its groups into desperados who fight one another to maintain a modicum of control over their increasingly restricted and empty lives."

But when it reprinted Khouri's original column, the Globe omitted an essential line: "The Palestinians, especially their leaders, must assume most of the blame for this round of fighting" (see "Palestinian Kids Who Conquer Tree Houses" Aug. 6, at www.agenceglobal.com).

So while Khouri clearly blames Israel for much of the internal discord among the Palestinians, the Globe's edit makes his criticism appear even more weighted against the Jewish state.

The Globe also omitted another line in which Khouri charged that "Israel and other enemies of the Palestinians will be pleased to see them fighting each other like juvenile delinquents."

This is hardly fair to the majority of Israelis, who are definitely not gloating now and who support the creation of a Palestinian state, but don't believe – since Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat rejected statehood at Camp David/Taba in 2000-2001 – that an effective Palestinian leadership will emerge any time soon.

JNF, JOSEPH AND WOLF LEBOVIC
HELPING TO BUILD ISRAEL TOGETHER

World JNF Chairman Efi Stenzler and Joe Lebovic prepare to dedicate the reservoir marker

The marker is dedicated

It was a festive Thursday afternoon in mid June when citizens and leaders of the Lachish Municipality gathered together with the leadership of Jewish National Fund/Keren Kayemeth L'Israel and guests from Israel and Canada to officially dedicate The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Reservoir. This important element in support of agricultural undertakings in the Lachish vicinity was made possible through funds donated by Joseph and Wolf Lebovic and over fourteen hundred friends who attended the 2005 Toronto Negev Dinner Tribute in their honour. Shortly after the Dinner, construction began on the Reservoir and the completed structure now fully services the needs of the vicinity, an important area of vineyards in Israel. The World Chairman of JNF/Keren Kayemeth, Mr. Efi Stenzler, officiated at the ceremony of dedication. A number of local dignitaries played a role in the dedication ceremony.

The highlight came with the unveiling of the dedication pillar by Joe Lebovic himself, following his remarks to the assembled guests. Joe called this project "one of the best undertakings my brother Wolf and I have funded in Israel". Joseph and Wolf Lebovic are well-known Toronto philanthropists, who are major benefactors of Mount Sinai Hospital, Scarborough General Hospital, Markham Stouffville Hospital, Scarborough Centenary Hospital and a vast array of Jewish community groups and organizations. Their gift was the cornerstone of the new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Thornhill. At the time of the Negev Dinner in tribute to them in 2005, the Lebovics made the single largest gift to JNF ever made.

Upon his return from Israel, Joe Lebovic commented how moved he was by the Reservoir Dedication ceremony and by the fact that the people of Lachish would benefit so greatly from this undertaking. JNF Toronto's Executive Director, Ben Prossin, called Joe and Willy "two of the outstanding philanthropists in the history of our community". He said that their generosity will affect many generations to come and the names of Joe and Willy will rank high in the pantheon of community leaders in this city, indeed in this country. JNF Toronto President Jerry Werger called the Lebovic Brothers outstanding citizens who provided a wonderful example to their confreres and to an-up-and-coming generation. "They are showing the way in terms of giving back to the community after having received so much".

The people of Toronto, not just the Jewish community, are most appreciative of the wonderful philanthropy of these two brothers who came to Canada's shores as immigrants and now serve as inspiring examples of good citizenship in this country.

Hashomer Hatzair marks 85 years in Canada

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On July 26, more than 100 alumni of Camp Shomria trekked up to the shores of Lake Otty in Perth, Ont., for a summer reunion.

The event also marked the 85th anniversary of Hashomer Hatzair Canada, a socialist Zionist movement that began in 1923 as a youth movement organized by Jewish immigrants from Europe who set up their first summer camps in 1928 as a means of preparing "groups of young adults for communal farming and life on kibbutzim in Israel."

Presently, the overnight camp is headed by a shaliach who acts as camp director.

According to Hashomer Hatzair's mission statement, the organization created Camp Shomria to provide campers and staff "with valuable opportunities to educate, learn about, and develop a greater understanding and appreciation for Israel, Jewish culture, Jewish history, the importance of commitment to one's community, pluralism, and social justice."

Its programs are also designed to "attract and serve young people who may not otherwise have an opportunity for community involvement."

Gila Gladstone-Martow, 47, a former camper and now a promoter for Shomria, told The CJN that the reunion-anniversary gathering brought back fond memories.

"This is the second reunion I've been to, the other one was the 65th [anniversary]. I recognized so many people," she said.

Gladstone-Martow, who attended the camp from 1973 to 1977, recalled how Camp Shomria was always egalitarian in its philosophy and that one of its benefits was that it forced campers to be creative with their time, as well as to learn responsibility and strike up friendships built on mutual respect.

"Make-up, nail polish and other [superficial] things were sometimes outright banned from the camp," Gladstone-Martow said. "But it was the friendships and Israeli folk-dancing that I remember best. It was a very kibbutz-like atmosphere."

With a capacity of "around 200 campers" per session, the camp isn't necessarily the biggest one out there, but it does have a distinctive flavour, she said.

"This is a Jewish camp that is Israeli-style, and not many people know about it. Camp Shomria also tends towards a more artistic, musical and creative type atmosphere. So it's not very sports oriented," Gladstone-Martow said.

The event also saw the unveiling of a plaque at Camp Shomria's Beit Tarbut – "house of culture" – for the Mia Gladstone Art Program, in commemoration of Gladstone-Martow's mother, who died last November.

The environmentally conscious art program "recycles and reuses as much as possible, as well as using non-toxic products when possible," Gladstone-Martow said.

Another former camper, Mara Mazer (neé Bernbaum) started dating her future husband, Andy, while at camp in 1983 – she attended from 1975 to 1984 – and recalled her own happy memories that were triggered by the reunion.

Mazer, 46, a teacher at Leo Baeck Day School's northern campus, said her summers at Camp Shomria were the best years of her life.

"They shaped who I am today. It's different than other camps… there's a ruach [spirit] that exists that you don't find at other camps. Everyone knows everyone. It's youth leading youth, and everyone is always accepted, no matter what," she said.

The influence of Hashomer Hatzair has spanned generations in Mazer's family, starting with her mother, who attended Camp Shomria in 1950 while it was still situated north of Montreal in the Laurentians, and now with her two sons, both of whom attend the camp.

"Though we weren't very religious, my parents wanted me and my sisters to be connected somehow to Israel and the Jewish community in some way," Mazer said.

"I credit my time with Hashomer Hatzair for making me want to give back to the Jewish community."

Mazer said as a result of last month's reunion, she's decided to become active in Hashomer Hatzair again and volunteered to help with the camp "in any way I can."

Beth Torah Congregation
קהילת בית תורה

Beth Torah Congregation

Construction has begun!
Our membership is open, but not for long!

Our founding members dreamed of a family Shul in which to congregate, celebrate, educate, and grow. They wanted a haimish environment where families knew one another from generation to generation.

Today, Beth Torah Congregation continues to be a vibrant, traditional and growing Shul with dedicated and warm clergy, Rabbi Yossi Sapirman and Cantor David Young.

Construction has now begun on our new sanctuary and the renovation of our facility. This is your chance to be a part of Completing the Dream.

There are a limited number of membership opportunities still available. Once we have achieved our goal of 500 families, we will no longer be accepting new member applications.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

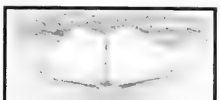
Learning to be kind

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH



Rabbinic Reflections

Some time ago, while observing my congregants, I wondered what makes my place of worship different. What distinguishes the congregation that I serve and what characteristic am I particularly proud of?

Before answering this question, I would like to share with you a conversation I once had. I was approached by a woman who had taken it upon herself to study the Bible. In the midst of her reading journey, she shared with me her bewilderment as to why the Tanach is so filled with violence, treachery and suffering.

In response, I remembered the words of my teacher and rebbe, Rabbi Aryeh Leib Baron, who summed up this enigma with a simple and gentle truth: the Tanach represents the journey of mankind from being a diamond in the rough toward an ongoing process of refinement – what we call civilization, defined by most dictionaries as a society that has a high level of culture and social organization.

Plato said that "poetry is nearer to vital truth than history." Those of us who have spent countless hours reciting and studying the Psalms of the poet of Israel, King David, will testify to their veracity, with words that "pluck the strings with just the touch the human heart craves."

If you have ever read Hannah's prayer to the Almighty at a time when she was barren and longed for children, and years later was destined to lose her seven sons in the sanctification God's name, you cannot remain indifferent to it.

What makes us human if not the distinct ability to feel empathy for creatures and fellow humans? But feeling empathy is not enough. One must act on this feeling with intelligent compassion. We begin by understanding what compassion and empathy mean, as defined by a standard dictionary. Empathy is the ability to identify with and understand somebody else's feelings or difficulties. Compassion is defined as sympathy for the suffering of others, and often includes a desire to help. Sympathy is the the ability to enter into, understand or share somebody else's feelings.

Clearly, the mark of a civilized nation is its ability not only to feel for the unfortunate and those suffering from personal crisis, but also the ability to perform immediate and appropriate acts to help and give relief to those in need.

This, I observed, is the hallmark of the synagogue that I serve at the Maimonides Geriatric Hospital. Congregants from the outside take it upon themselves to assist the elderly residents who might not be very mobile. Those acts of kindness vary from wishing residents a simple "Shabbat Shalom" to helping them with their religious devotions.

Even more touching is the involvement of young children. These four- to 12-year-olds will push a resident's wheelchair to the bimah for an aliyah or prepare the kiddush table and help serve kiddush to the residents.

This is first-hand chinuch (education) for the children in understanding the meaning of kindness to the elderly and those incapacitated by an illness. It's amazing how these children do this naturally and with such pride and pleasure, and the residents receive immense enjoyment from watching these angels at work.

So this is what makes me so proud to serve this congregation. Acts of chesed (kindness) thrive vibrantly amidst our prayer, and that is a true brachah!

Rabbi Cadoch is spiritual leader of the Beth HaRambam Synagogue at the Maimonides Geriatric Hospital in Montreal.

Taking aim at a straw man

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

It's open season on God.

From Sam Harris to Richard Dawkins to perhaps the most entertainingly provocative of them all, Christopher Hitchens, a trend that the Nation magazine calls the "New Atheism" is in vogue. Attacking religion with flourish – as the province of irrationality and even fanaticism – these writers have captured legions of fans and spots on the bestseller lists.

Marx, whom one would think might be sympathetic to Hitchens' project, would likely have noted wryly that Hitchens has become a very rich atheist.

Nonetheless, I find little to get perturbed by in Hitchens' assault on religion. In fact, in his parody of Judaism, I barely recognize the religion that I practise daily, and I suspect that many sincere and sophisticated Christians and Muslims might concur regarding their own worlds.

One of the problems with the author's methodology is his unfortunate habit of portraying the very worst elements or particular historical incidents in a religious tradition and offering them up as typical representations of that faith. The implication is ludicrous. Instead of comparing the darkest that a religion has to offer against the shiny world of secular scientific rationalism, what would happen if the analogies were inverted and we placed the Dalai Lama, Maimonides and Mother Theresa in relation to Stalin or, more trivially, Michael Jackson and Paris Hilton.

Hitchens' shtick has been done before, and far better to boot.

Spinoza, Hume and Kant, without appearing on CNN and talk radio, managed to raise penetrating and often painful questions about organized religion long before the current crop of self-righteous anti-God prophets.

Or as Prof. Christopher Roberts at Villanova University asserts: "If Nietzsche and Schopenhauer start climbing the New York Times bestseller list, then I'll be impressed. Here are the kinds of atheists who can keep... [a religious person] up late at night, and who merit a rousing response in the morning."

Jews themselves have a long tradition of questioning God, as well as struggling with the meaning of mitzvot and the tension between law and spirituality, and inward piety and external discipline.

From the wrestling with theodicy that lies at the heart of the Book of Job to the 19th-century chassidic masters who stripped religion to its bare essence in an unending search to find what is pure and true – the Kotzker Rebbe being the quintessence of this fierce quest – Jews have never been shy about subjecting their own faith to an unending litany of questions.

Perhaps the epitome of this came with the literature that emerged out of the shadow of the Holocaust. Who can fail to carry questions about the goodness of God after reading Elie Wiesel's anguished cry in Night that God is hanging on the gallows along with murdered young Jewish boys?

That's the kind of gravitas that the new atheists cannot, and will not, ever achieve. Their skepticism is aimed at a straw man of religion, far less real than the ghosts of Auschwitz.

An Orthodox rabbi with unorthodox opinions

You Don't Have To Be Wrong For Me To Be Right* by Brad Hirschfield, Harmony Books.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This is a book by an Orthodox rabbi with many unorthodox opinions. He was reared in a Chicago secular family, but decided at the age of 12 to become observant.

"When I told my mother that I wanted to keep kosher, she looked at me long and hard. "I will not buy separate pots and pans and silverware for you," she finally said. "What I will do is this – if you will wait until summer when I have more time, I will make the entire house kosher. You don't eat off separate dishes from the rest of us in your own home."

"But," she continued, "I hope that keeping kosher will not keep you from going out to dinner with us, because that's also part of what it means to be a family." He confides that after that fateful conversation he dined at some of the world's finest restaurants and ate only salad while his family feasted.

Later on, young Brad began to wear a kippah. His outraged grandmother grabbed him by the hair, tore the kippah from his head and threw it on the floor. "I did not come to America for this foolishness," she thundered.

The whole family witnessed the scene. "I'll never forget my mother who stood up straight and said with a clear sense of the truth and rightness of her words, 'No Bubbie, you are wrong. You came to America so that he could wear the kippah if that is what he wants to do.'"

Rabbi Hirschfield shares these emotional moments to emphasize that abiding trust and faith can be established when a wise parent respects the choice of her children, even if she doesn't agree with them.

In the early 1980s, he joined an extremist group of settlers in the West Bank city of Hebron. He served as a guide for tourists with a Bible in one hand and a gun in the other. Then something happened that shook him to the core. A group of settlers responding to an Arab attack fired wildly into a school and killed two Palestinian children. Suddenly he realized that the beliefs that had been driving his life were deeply flawed. He left the settlers movement. "The lesson I learned in Hebron," he writes, "was that the best things can become the most seductive – and deadly."

After participating in a forum on the subject of Jewish identity, he confesses, "That night was the first time I said out loud to a Jewish audience what I had felt for some time. If some genie offered me a contract that guaranteed that each of my three daughters would find the love of their lives and create loving, supportive, successful lifelong relationships with wonderful, intelligent, caring gentile partners, I would sign in a heartbeat.

"I want my girls to marry Jews, and I have created a life that makes it entirely more likely that they will, but I realize that when I say I want them to marry Jews it may not be the most evolved part of myself talking. My deepest desire is to guarantee my children's happiness, not the Jewishness of the person with whom the find it."

I suppose the operative word in this surprising declaration is "guarantee" – something no one can ever give him.

Rabbi Hirschfield declares that his work has been the effort to build bridges between peoples of different faiths, including no faith at all, and to help people discover that no one is ever 100 per cent right or 100 per cent wrong.

The rabbi is president of the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership and is a popular radio and television commentator. Newsweek magazine named him one of the top 50 rabbis in America. I don't know the criteria, but I didn't even come close.

Hebrew resources on the web

Ha'im ata rotzeh lilmod Ivrit?

Do you want to learn Hebrew?

It doesn't matter whether you're a student getting ready to return to school or you haven't practised your Hebrew since your cheder days. The Internet provides incredible resources for people who want to improve their Hebrew. And what better time than Israel's 60th to hone your skills? Today, a look at some online resources for people with beginners and intermediate Hebrew.

Whatever your level of Hebrew, your first stop should be at Yale University. The Yale Hebraica Team has done an outstanding job explaining the history of the language along with giving an introduction to the 22-letter alphabet, as well as gathering links to some of the best Hebrew resources on the web. [tinyurl.com/hebraica] That Yale has such a good Hebrew website shouldn't come as a total surprise since the university required Hebrew as a basic curriculum course for freshmen in 1777. The essay "How Hebrew Came to Yale" explains the special relationship that Rabbi Haim Isaac Carigal had with Yale's fifth president, Rev. Ezra Stiles. [tinyurl.com/yaleurim]

Aklah may have been designed as a kids' site, but it has some great resources for anyone learning Hebrew. The alphabet page has sound files for each Hebrew letter, printable flashcards, alphabet colouring pages and much more. Click on "more information" for instructions on how to write each letter. [tinyurl.com/akhlah] The Akhlah home page has more Hebrew exercises. [akhlah.com] Also, check out these Alef Bet links. [tinyurl.com/alefbet]

Once you've mastered the alphabet and a few basic words, you're ready for the Starting with Aleph site. This delightful and sophisticated tutorial not only quizzes you about the spelling of some basic words, it also gives you an introduction to the mystical beauty of the Hebrew alphabet. [tinyurl.com/ 5bqopf] (This site requires payment, however, the first lesson is free.)

Aleph-Bet on the Net is an excellent tutorial that tests your knowledge of Hebrew words and phrases. When you see Hebrew words flashed on the screen, you are asked to type in the English equivalent. And when English appears, so does an on-screen Hebrew keyboard so that you can type in the proper Hebrew response. [tinyurl.com/6o87p4] (Note: worked on a PC only.)

Creating an online English/Hebrew – Hebrew/English dictionary is not a simple task, but Morfix is up to the challenge. Going from English to Hebrew is simple enough: just type in the word and hit enter. In order to go the other way, first click on the word "mikledet" and a virtual Hebrew keyboard will appear. As you use it to type in Hebrew letters, the characters will automatically appear in the Morfix screen. When done, hit enter and you get the English translation. [milon.morfix.co.il]

For anyone who is used to the English-language QWERTY keyboard and wants to learn to type in Hebrew the correct way, I highly recommend ZigZag's Hebrew Keyboard Tutor. On your screen, you'll see a miniature Hebrew keyboard – A, S, D, F become shin, dalet, gimel, kaf. As the giraffe hangs Hebrew letters on a clothesline, you are prompted to tap the corresponding key. There are five levels to keep you busy, and the program even keeps track of your accuracy and speed. Engrossing and exasperating. [zigzagworld.com/HKTutor/]

Stay at ZigZagWorld for the best website to learn more of the language through games and puzzles. [zigzagworld.com/hebrewforme]

That should keep you busy for a few days. Next week, learning Hebrew by listening.

Last month, I devoted two articles to genetic testing and support available for people with Jewish genetic illnesses. Dr. Shirley Katz Just wrote to mention that in Ontario almost all genetic testing is covered by the Ministry of Health. A Hospital for Sick Children screening requisition can be downloaded from a link at the site whatsinyourgenes.com (which was created by Just's daughter, Caroline, as a bat mitzvah project several years ago.) [tinyurl.com/genetest] She added that the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada is holding a screening day in Winnipeg on Sept. 21. [jacobsladder.ca]

Mark Mietkiewicz is a Toronto-based Internet producer who writes, lectures and teaches about the Jewish Internet. He can be reached at highway@rogers.com.

Cousins club flourishing on its 50th anniversary

By SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It's sad, but not unusual, for distant cousins to pass each other on the street and never know they are related.

Zalman Beranbaum, the eldest of Miriam and Hersh's six children, decided that family was too important to let this happen to his own. In January 1958, he called all 16 Beranbaum grandchildren together – the name means pear tree in Yiddish – for a meeting and said, "We know each other. Let's stay close." With that, the Beranbaum Cousins Club was formed.

Fast forward 50 years. It's May 2008 and the cousins club members are holding their last monthly meeting of the season

The Beranbaum family

– the 398th since the group was formed – and making arrangements for their 50th anniversary celebration coming up in June.

Jokes fly across the room. "If you miss the last meeting of the year," shouts one cousin, "you're going to be on the board the next year!" finishes another.

It's evident they are all good friends – which is the objective of this club. Their 1958 constitution declared their purpose was "to promote and bond together all participating members into a strong family unit." They appear to be succeeding so far.

"It helps if you like each other," says Gayle Green, the current club president. "We've tried forming a club with our other family branch," she adds. "It didn't work. Not enough people like each other or are willing to work at keeping it together."

Other members nod in agreement and speak about how unique they feel their family is. They claim there are no rifts. Feel-good comments abound: "We really are friends… We actually like each other… well, we're pretty tolerant of each other." More laughter in the room. You can feel the camaraderie.

Three grandchildren of Miriam and Hersh attend this night. Others are the children, spouses and grandchildren of these original three. Since 1958, every month has seen strong turnout. Meetings include a historian's report, where archived minutes and photos are presented, and then there's time to catch up on each other's lives. Who is travelling? Find out in the "cruise report." Who's engaged, ill or celebrating a birthday? The "sunshine report" tells all. And it's not a successful meeting unless you take home a few good jokes, the members say. A discussion of where to donate money collected for their special account rounds out the meetings. In the past, the club has supported causes including Lupus and Cancer research, Sunnybrook Hospital, Zareinu Educational Centre and Baycrest Centre.

The highlight for members are the social events. Programs that draw all the members and their children include a Chanukah bowling party, a summer picnic and the annual closing dinner. Members-only events include Purim parties, car rallies, murder mystery evenings and an infamous Miss Poland drag fashion show.

After most meetings, out comes the club's psychedelic, flowered, 1960s bingo case with the original slide bingo cards in it. Everyone looks forward to the monthly game.

"We make the big bucks," says Laury Snow, a founding member. "If we're lucky, we go home with an extra 20 cents!"

Out-of-towners from Hamilton, Waterdown and London attend events. Hamiltonian Al Burns is the most senior member at 92. The babies of the group are 40-something Chuck Rothman and his wife Janice in Thornhill.

"People make the effort, even on a snowy December night," says Barry Green, another cousin. "They come because they know how important this family is and how much fun we have."

Frimette Snow, a founding member and the original historian of the club, offers advice to those wishing to form a cousins club. "Most importantly, members must have a strong commitment to the continuity of the family," she says. Strong organizers are paramount, as a club is nothing without its meetings and events.

Even this club, however, is concerned about its future. The next generation, who are in their 20s to 40s, are not as interested in joining as the previous generation. Members express their hope that the anniversary event may help motivate the next generation to attend and ultimately help the club live on.

They get to find out. At the club's dinner and 50th anniversary celebration on June 25, four generations gather together at a Toronto restaurant. Young and old share stories and catch up on the latest family news.

Cheeks are pinched, bingo is played and history is made. Bubbie and Zayde Beranbaum, gone but definitely not forgotten, are most certainly kvelling with pride somewhere as their pear tree continued to flourish.

Jews in canoes: a summertime odyssey

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Stephen Altbaum may be an accountant by profession, but he'd rather be paddling on the waterways of Algonquin park.

Luckily, that's exactly what he and some friends will do again this summer as part of an annual Jewish canoe trip.

Now in its 30th year, it's become an excursion of faith, friendship and food, which sees Altbaum and seven friends hitting Ontario's waterways and campgrounds, bonding as men do over rugged terrain by day and over hearty meals (and the occasional libation) by campfire at night.

"We bring way too much food," Altbaum admitted in a recent interview with the Canadian Jewish News.

But what started out as an annual summer "guy" trip to simply get away from it all – they've given the trip the tongue-in-cheek title "Deliverance" – has become a more spiritual affair for the men, Altbaum, 59, said.

"Wherever we are we make Kiddush and light candles on Shabbat," he said. "And our chef, Phil Rubinoff, will break out the chopped liver and Jewish food. We also do Havdalah on Saturday nights."

Now in their 50s and 60s – Rubinoff is the exception at 75 and may be making his final trip this summer– each man has evolved his role on the trip over the years and has been given a nickname befitting his specialty.

Altbaum, the acknowledged organizer, has been making the trip for 28 years and is known as the "Fearless ligner," he quipped.

The others are Norm (The Shlepper) Godfrey; Joe (The Rebbe) Feldman; Sam (Sous Chef) Cordes; Stephen (The Bowman) Kauffman; Ben (Dov) Blufarb; Arnie (The Rookie) Glickman; and Rubinoff, known affectionately as "The Voice of Reason."

This year's "Deliverance" begins on Aug. 20, and the men started seriously readying themselves for it a couple of months in advance, working out more diligently than usual to get in shape for the sometimes gruelling portages required of them on the trail.

In a pre-trip meeting last month, Altbaum, Rubinoff and Cordes told The CJN about what the trip means to them as friends and as Jews.

"After a couple of years doing this, I remember thinking, 'How did I ever get by without it?,'" Altbaum said. "There's this amazing chemistry between us. Sure, we've had our small problems, someone will get on someone else's nerves. But this group has kept a lot of psychiatrists out of work."

Cordes, the trip's official photographer, concurred, saying that the camaraderie on the trip helps in innumerable ways.

"We give each other free professional advice, too," he said.

Over the course of the interview, all three kibbitz and rib each other back and forth like a bunch of high-school buddies. But it's clear they share a deep fondness for one another.

"We would do anything for each other," Altbaum said.

Rubinoff laughingly added: "It's a guy thing. My wife called us a cult. We've been there for each other for all sorts of support."

They're also there for others when the need arises.

Like a band of roaming, helpful Jewish woodsmen who appear in the nick of time to save the day, the Deliverance boys have earned a reputation with backpackers, campers and park rangers alike for their various acts of backwoods chesed for many moons.

One story the men like to recount is the time they came across a group of campers and counsellors fresh off their own canoe trip.

Feldman (The Rebbe) sparked up a conversation with one of the campers and found out he was Jewish and that the boy's mother had recently passed away.

Distraught, the boy wanted to say Kaddish for his mom, but couldn't find a minyan while out in the wilderness.

Enter the Deliverance crew, who immediately helped him form the minyan and say the mourner's prayers on the spot.

Another instance of spontaneous Jewish assistance occurred when the men came across a couple of shomer Shabbat campers who were caught alongside them in an interminable portage line backlog.

Afraid they wouldn't get back to their campsite in time to retrieve and light their Shabbat candles, the Deliverance men lent them some of theirs.

But their woodsy generosity and goodness isn't limited solely to the Jewish faith. The men also help campers of all stripes, often sharing their abundant food and knowledge with those in need.

They also welcome non-Jews on their trip.

A Macedonian Christian friend "with a deep affinity for Jewish ritual" once accompanied the men on the trip, Feldman said.

"By the end of the trip, we'd taught him to make Hamotzi," Altbaum recalled. "The next year he went on… another trip and we asked him how it was. He said, 'It was useless. They didn't even make Shabbat!'"

And he liked the fact that the trip had an "ample supply" of single malt scotch and ice, Feldman wisecracked.

Feldman took credit for bringing the Deliverance trip "halachically up to par" after he "became frum" about 13 years ago.

"I asked that we kasher all the utensils and stay shomer Shabbas, and to their credit, all the guys were happy and respectful of it," Feldman said.

Asked about the spiritual quality of the trip, Feldman said that in many ways being out in the woods helps bring the men closer to God.

"There is a sense that HaShem wanted us to see and experience his wonderful world. So we're always very careful to leave a campsite better than we found it."

Seniors home to close branch in north Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The completion of the newly expanded Sharon Home in south Winnipeg and the closing of its northern branch next month will leave the north end of the Manitoba capital without a Jewish seniors residence for the first time in more than 95 years.

The transfer of residents from the north end facility to the south end residence is scheduled to start at the beginning of September, with the last residents being moved by Sept. 18.

The north end Sharon Home is slated to become a government-operated residence for patients recovering from addictions or suffering from mental illness.

Sandra Delorme, the Sharon Home's president and CEO for the past six years, compared the newly expanded south Winnipeg facility to a five-star hotel.

"I have been in the health care field for 35 years, and I have never seen anything else of this calibre," she said.

Winnipeg has had a Jewish seniors residence in the north end since 1912, and the Sharon Home had been at the same north end address since 1940.

The residence, which had been modernized several times over the years, had 157 beds.

In keeping with the growing Jewish community in south Winnipeg in recent years and the corresponding decline of the Jewish population in the north end, the community first built a south Winnipeg branch of the Sharon Home in 2002. That facility cost $12 million to build (including $3 million raised from within the community) and had 72 beds. Meals were prepared in the north end and delivered to the south end residence.

The new work on the south end Sharon Home – Phase 2 of a three-phase process – cost $31 million (with $6 million raised by the Jewish community) and more than doubled its number of beds to 200.

During a tour of the south Winnipeg building, Delorme pointed out a number of the highlights. For example, the facility now has two completely separate kitchens – one for meat and one for dairy.

The additions also include a new, dedicated synagogue (the multipurpose room used to double as a shul), as well as a kosher dining room, a private dining room for families, and areas dedicated to the Kanee and Simkin families, who were major supporters of the Sharon Home.

In addition, the facility now includes a walking track – the first such track in a nursing home in North America, Delorme said – where residents recovering from hip surgery or a stroke can be put in a sling to reduce the risk of falling, and to relieve the weight on the damaged area while they learn to walk again.

Every residential wing has 20 beds, two dining areas and two recreational areas. Rooms are also connected so that husbands and wives can share the same space.

For safety, Delorme said every resident and every staff person will have a computerized badge so that everyone can be tracked at all times. Temporary staff will also have access to the name and photo of every resident to avoid problems with identification.

Phase 3 will be an addition for residents who require assisted living but may not yet need a nursing home, Delorme said.

"We will probably start planning the next phase in December or January," she said.

GAME PLAYERS: More than 250 women came together recently for the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary's second annual Games Girls Play event. Held at the Terraces of Baycrest, it raised $25,000 for Baycrest. St. Thomas University starts Holocaust centre

By JOEL JACOBSON
Staff Reporter

HALIFAX — St. Thomas University, a liberal arts institution in Fredericton, N.B., is establishing a Holocaust centre to raise awareness of the plight of Holocaust victims during World War II, as well as other genocides throughout the 20th and into the 21st centuries.

Philip Riteman, a retired Halifax businessman, is a Holocaust survivor who has spoken about his excruciating experience to hundreds of school, university and church groups in Canada and the United States in the last 20 years.

In early July, after being presented an honorary doctorate by the university, he was asked to unveil a plaque commemorating his story of survival from the death camps of Europe. The plaque will be prominently displayed at the front of the St. Thomas University Holocaust Centre.

That brought him to tears a week later as he spoke of the new centre.

"I had no idea they were [asking me to officially dedicate the opening]," he said, embarrassed. "I'm just representing the millions of victims and the many, many survivors."

Michael McGowan, a professor in the university's department of human rights and the centre's director, said 2008 is the 10th anniversary of the human rights program at St. Thomas University, in which students can receive a bachelor of arts.

"We were the first university to offer this program," he said. "The Holocaust was the driving force for starting the program. We want to change attitudes, minds and hearts. The Holocaust was the end product of hate. We need to deal with that."

He said the centre will educate young people about the tragedies that transpire when prejudice, racism and hate target groups in society. "People learn to hate and they can learn to stop hating by knowledge, understanding and engagement with others. We want to bring students together from across Canada and around the world to increase their knowledge of genocide and equip them to become leaders in their work for peace, understanding and respect."

McGowan said more than 25 students from St. Thomas' human rights program have visited Holocaust sites in the last few years. They have met survivors such as Philip Riteman, heard their stories and better understand the issues of hate and discrimination.

"I've seen a marked difference in our students after they've been on the ground in Treblinka, for example, and heard people there talk of their experience," he said. "They come back here and it's amazing what they've done, in their own classes, and in their communities. Many of our human rights graduates are teachers and have taken this to their classes."

He said the students have hosted Holocaust Awareness Week and Genocide Awareness Week at the university.

"The place is usually packed for presentations. Young people want to hear from these students, and want to try to understand what's happening in the Sudan and other areas now by putting them under the microscope of the Holocaust."

He said the Holocaust centre will deliver educational programs for students and professional groups, provide scholarships, organize seminars and conferences, and sponsor public lectures by scholars. The new centre will co-operate with other organizations such as the Simon Wiesenthal Center, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Canadian Centre for Diversity and the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem.

A fundraising campaign will be launched for the Endowment Fund of the St. Thomas University Holocaust Centre, and an advisory board will guide the centre's activities.

QIC launches internship program

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As a way to encourage young Jewish graduates in the province to get experience in political and public affairs, the Quebec-Israel Committee has launched an annual parliamentary internship program.

The pilot project will allow – at least in the first year – three recent Jewish graduates to live in Quebec City for nine months and work as aides to MNAs from the three main political parties.

Their duties, among others, would include working with MNAs "in different sectors, particularly in parliamentary committees, correspondence, and work in the [MNA's] riding."

The new program, which is being run in collaboration with Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, is modelled after a similar one in place for several years at the federal level and run by the Canada-Israel Committee.

But the provincial program's aims go beyond simple involvement in governmental affairs or the political process, said QIC executive director Luciano Del Negro.

In the wake of the reasonable accommodation debate and subsequent Bouchard-Taylor Commission report, he said, it's important for young Quebec Jews to deal with a perceived "disconnect" between themselves and their fellow Quebecers.

The QIC will give each intern a $12,000 bursary to cover expenses. "It's certainly not a lot," Del Negro said, "But it's a fair amount of money for someone who wishes to take nine months out of their lives."

'Charismatic' activist fought for refuseniks

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eugenie (Genya) Intrator will be remembered by former refusenik Natan Sharansky and countless others as a pioneering activist on behalf of Jews in the former Soviet Union who were not allowed to emigrate to Israel.

Genya Intrator

Intrator died July 31 at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, two weeks after being diagnosed with liver cancer. She was 81.

In an online memorial book, Sharansky and his wife, Avital, wrote that, in the "1970s and '80s, the years of the most intense struggle of Soviet Jewry, the name Genya Intrator was both a symbol of the direct link and strong bond of world Jewry to our daily lives."

Intrator was born in Moscow, emigrated with her parents to Palestine at age 7, and served as a member of the Haganah under the British Mandate and then as an officer in the Israeli army from 1948 to 1950, immediately before immigrating to Toronto with her husband, Alfred.

She found her calling when she was an adult student of literature and political science at the University of Toronto.

The BA that Intrator earned in 1974 would serve her well as a public speaker, when she used language that "was elegant and grabbed the soul," said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation, who spoke at her funeral.

Because Intrator spoke Russian, Jewish student activists at the forefront of the grassroots Soviet Jewry movement asked her to translate during an initial phone call to a refusenik in 1970.

Around the same time, she was visited by the Israeli consul based in New York, who informed her that Soviet refuseniks were forbidden to emigrate until their knowledge of state secrets became obsolete, an anecdote she later recalled in a two-page contribution to a book called Voices from the Heart: a Community Celebrates 50 Years of Israel.

She also learned that refuseniks were fired from their jobs, and were made into pariahs because their requests to emigrate were considered acts of disloyalty.

The consul gave Intrator a list of refuseniks to call so that she could provide moral support, obtain information about persecution and human rights violations, and let the KGB know (as its agents monitored the calls) that western democracies were aware of the refuseniks' plight, which was being publicized worldwide.

In 1973, Intrator met with refuseniks in Moscow, Kiev and what was then Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) during her first trip to the Soviet Union. She travelled with her husband, who was attending a dental convention, said their daughter, Orna Spira.

"I knew then that I would dedicate every moment of my life to save them," Intrator wrote in the book.

Throughout Sharansky's nine-year imprisonment, she was in touch with his family in Moscow every week, and she organized petitions, demonstrations, sit-ins and hunger strikes with his wife, Avital.

Intrator was "one of the first visitors who brought out information to the West," Spira said.

In 1973, Intrator founded Women for Soviet Jewry, a forerunner of the Canadian Committee for Soviet Jewry, under the auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress. She served as national president of the committee from 1975 to 1983.

Among her many other endeavours, she started refusenik support groups in organizations and synagogues across Canada, and she represented Canada in Helsinki in 1975 during the signing of the Helsinki accords, demonstrating in front of the car of then-Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev and getting arrested in the process.

She also founded an organization called the Inter-Religious Task Force (in 1984), wrote a weekly column for the Toronto Sun from 1984 to 1994 on human rights in the Soviet Union, and served as president of Women's Canadian ORT from 1982 to 1984.

Her efforts earned her wide recognition, including awards from Jewish organizations.

Spira told The CJN that her mother liked to say she was "in the business of saving lives."

On a personal note, she added that Intrator "was full of zest and vitality, and always wanted people over."

She said that if someone called at 4 p.m. to let her mother know they were visiting from out of town, by 6 o'clock she had organized a "fantastic dinner party.

"She wanted to introduce everybody to somebody. She just loved people."

Rabbi Tanenbaum said Intrator – a meticulous record-keeper whose files were recently donated to the National Archives of Canada – was "fearless… brilliant, dynamic, charismatic, larger than life, effective… and knew how to find humour in everyday life. At the same time, she was a no-nonsense person."

Bernie Farber, national CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, where Intrator served on the national executive, told The CJN that not only was she a leader at a time when it was rare for a woman to do that type of work, but she "was adored by everybody, professionals and lay leaders alike."

Having met her when he was a teenager in 1968, Farber credited Intrator "to a significant degree" with inspiring him to work for the Canadian Jewish community.

Intrator leaves her daughters Daphne Intrator and Orna Spira. She was predeceased by her husband Alfred 10 years ago.

Preschool receives funding from City of Toronto

The rabbi, who established the school in 1997 to address needs in Toronto's Russian Jewish community, said that members of the community – which numbers about 40,000 individuals – had wanted a general studies program that was closer to what they had experienced in Europe, and fewer demands in terms of Jewish practice than they had found in some other Jewish schools.

Although there were no demands or judgmentalism regarding Jewish practice at Ohr Menachem, Rabbi Zaltzman said that Jewish tradition was taught "without compromise."

The school was affiliated with the Mercaz, but never received funding from it.

"We had an ongoing dialogue with Ohr Menachem over many years," said Seymour Epstein, the federation's senior vice-president for the Mercaz.

Affiliation is the first step toward funding, Epstein explained.

He added that Ohr Menachem "never managed to make the second step," which involves meeting 32 individual criteria under five broad areas of compliance, including "a total enrolment of no fewer than 100 students for elementary schools (grades 1-8)" according to a Mercaz document.

"Any Jewish school that closes down is a sad story," Epstein said, noting that the circumstances surrounding Ohr Menachem's closing differ from those of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school for children with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and mild forms of autism, which closed its doors in June.

Earlier this year, a joint federation-She'arim committee made a recommendation to the She'arim board to close the school, while Epstein said he learned of Ohr Menachem's closing only after the decision had been made by that school's board.

In order for Ohr Menachem to become affiliated with the then-BJE, it had to become independent of the JRCC, under whose auspices it began, Rabbi Zaltzman noted. Originally, it was under the same charter and the same board.

The preschool, which Rabbi Zaltzman said receives funding from the City of Toronto, is located on Bathurst Street south of Steeles Avenue. Older children attended school in the JRCC's Thornhill building on Bathurst.

Last year, Ohr Menachem had 55 students in grades 1 through 8, compared to almost 80 three years ago, Rabbi Zaltzman said. Fourteen students graduated at the end of the year.

Kholodenko said that people "normally register at the last minute," so the 22 registered students for this fall did not necessarily reflect the expected size of the student population for the coming year.

However, there have been some dropouts due to the loss of art, music and other programs, which the school discontinued when they became too expensive to run, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

The rabbi has been meeting with parents individually to advise them about alternative educational options. He is also raising funds to cover outstanding teachers' salaries and to refund tuition deposits and prepayments for the coming year. Annual tuition at the school was $9,740 for Grades 1 to 8.

About $150,000 is needed to make up for the shortfall.

In a letter to parents dated Aug. 4, Kholodenko wrote that those who paid the registration fee for the coming year would receive a refund within two weeks.

Parents have been "understanding," he said. "Obviously they're upset that they don't have Ohr Menachem."

His children, who were students at the school, are "very upset," he said.

"The most painful piece is that it's such an obvious great need in the field of education, and even in a city like Toronto, we failed to have enough support to make it happen," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

"Hopefully, at some point, we will try and regroup," said Kholodenko. "There's a great desire to reopen, but a lot of things have to happen before we can bring it into reality."

More cures for cancers on the horizon: researcher

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

An Israeli scientist funded by the Israel Cancer Research Fund said he was confident that there will continue to be more cures for many types of cancer.

"I think that there are already many cures for cancer, and there are many more that will be coming up. You cannot expect a cure for cancer, you can expect many cures for many types of cancer.

"Each cancer has its own personality and own characteristics," said Dr. Yoav Henis, of the department of neurobiochemistry at Tel Aviv University. He was in Toronto last week to speak to potential and current donors about developments in his research.

"What will eventually happen – and we are already starting to see it – is that [treatment] will be tailor-made for patients of cancer."

He said that if a person learns that he or she has cancer, he or she should have genetic profiling done to determine which cocktail of drugs would be the best for treatment.

"It should be tailor-made, not one cure for all," he stressed.

Henis has been receiving funding for cancer research from the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), a charitable organization with chapters across North America that provides funding to support cancer research in Israel, for the past 14 years. He spoke to The CJN about the kind of research he and his team have been conducting.

Treatment will be tailor-made for patients

He explained that he uses biophysical methods to look at biological processes that happen in cells that make them become cancerous.

He said there are three systems that they focus on. They examine cells that express proteins that cause the cells to proliferate or divide in an uncontrolled manner.

"There are proteins that are called oncoproteins. When they go astray, they start to signal out an external cue, like a hormone, and this can contribute to the development of cancer," he said.

Henis and his research team – made up of a technician he has been working with for 26 years and eight PhD and master's students – also examine growth-inhibitory hormones that are meant to "start cascades of signalling when they are bound to specific receptor cells. The signals are supposed to cue the cells to stop growing, stop dividing," he said.

"The thing is that in these systems, when one of the proteins in the cascade stops functioning, you lose all the growth inhibition and it is like a car losing its brakes and it can contribute to the development of cancer."

He said he is also working to understand the motion of cancer cells – "how cells move about, how they leave their original place and go to wander about, which is actually related to metastases.

"You can have a very contained cancer, where the cells don't wander away. They remain where they are so you have one focus of cancer which makes it much easier to treat. On the other hand, when you have these cells from abnormal tissue start to wander about and get to other places in the body… it gets completely out of control and actually, there is no return from that," Henis said.

He said that with the funding from ICRF, he is able to continue investigating why a mutated form of Raf, an oncoprotein (a cell that divides uncontrollably), induces the mislocalization of a molecule, called p27, in a growth-inhibitory hormone called TGF-b (transforming growth factor-beta).

"A molecule that is involved with growth inhibition by TGF-b called p27, induces growth inhibition. It turns out that oncogenic Raf [a tumour-developing mutated form of the oncoprotein Raf] causes p27 to go out from the nucleus to the cytoplasm."

He said that as long as p27 is in the nucleus, TGF-b should send signals to the molecule and activate growth inhibition.

"But p27 is not in the nucleus anymore, so the signalling goes there but there is nobody home… It turns out when p27 is in the cytoplasm, then it can have a completely different effect and actually, it helps the cells to move about [and spread cancer]. Now we are trying to look in more details about how Raf induced this mislocalization of p27 from the nucleus to the cytoplasm."

Henis said that he does share his research with Canadian doctors and has maintained a relationship with Dr. Sergio Grinstein, a scientist at the Hospital for Sick Children. Grinstein doesn't do cancer research, but is interested in the interactions of the specific proteins that Henis examines.

He also stays in contact with Dr. Nils Petersen, formerly the vice-president for research and development at the University of Western Ontario and currently the general manager of the Canadian National Institute of Nanotechnology in Edmonton.

In addition to sharing his findings, Henis also spoke about how great the need for funding continues to be.

"Funding for research in Israel is much less than here. You apply for a grant [in Israel] the same as you would apply here, but the amount that you get is much smaller. I run my lab – and I am considered to do very well in recruiting grants for the research – I'm running the lab for something like $130,000 a year," which includes his salary and the salaries of his technicians.

He said that when the ICRF provides them with an extra $30,000 to $40,000 a year, it makes a big difference.

He said he's able to stretch the money he gets from the ICRF because it goes further in Israel than it would in Canada.

He said the students get paid much less in Israel than they do in Canada, but that doesn't compromise the quality of the student.

Henis boasted that two of his former students went to posts at Harvard University, another went to New York University and all returned to Israel to continue working in science and medicine.

"[The funding from ICRF] enables cancer researchers to work, enables young cancer researchers to develop… to start to build their own labs, and it develops the most precious thing that we have in Israel, which is actually the people, the scientists, themselves," Henis said.

"That is actually the only real asset that we have. We don't have any advantage in natural resources. This is our natural resource and the ICRF helps develop that."

Study looks at new ways to heal wounds in diabetics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A clinical trial to study the efficacy of hyperbaric oxygen in treating chronic non-healing wounds, a frequent complication of diabetes, is now underway.

The study is being done at the Judy Dan Wound Care Centre at the Branson division of North York General Hospital, in collaboration with the University of Toronto, McMaster University in Hamilton and Programs for Assessment of Technology in Health Research Institute (PATH). Lead investigators are Dr. Ludwik Fedorko, anesthesiologist at the University Health Network, and Dr. Ron Linden, medical director of the Judy Dan Wound Care Centre.

Two-thirds of the funding is being provided by the Ontario Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care. The remaining third, Linden said, will come from other sources.

In a previous interview, Linden explained that skin injuries that don't heal can be a side effect of diabetes, especially when the condition is not controlled by diet, exercise and/or medication.

"Blood vessels, especially the very small vessels, such as capillaries in the legs and feet, become damaged by high sugar concentrations. This impairs circulation, and not enough blood or oxygen goes to the feet.

"Cells that fight infection and allow healing don't get enough oxygen to do their job."

The result is that patients with uncontrolled diabetes can't feel it when their feet are injured, antibiotics can't get to the site because of the poor circulation, and the wound festers.

When wound infection reaches the bones, Linden said, physicians may recommend amputation.

For the study, patients spend two hours, five days a week, usually for 30 treatments, breathing 100 per cent oxygen in a hyperbaric chamber.

"The blood cells absorb oxygen, and they and the oxygen-saturated serum, the liquid fluid of the blood, carry it to the wound," Linden explained.

Last year, the Dan family, in memory of matriarch Judy Dan, established the Judy Dan Wound Care Centre. Three hyperbaric chambers were bought. Through donations, the centre has been able to double the number of hyperbaric chambers and add more treatment rooms.

While hyperbaric oxygen is well known as a treatment for decompression, this new use has shown great promise in preventing amputation.

Although most patients are diabetic, some have radiation wounds and other diseases.

"We are seeing more serious cases, people sent from other hospitals, coming on stretchers or in wheelchairs," Linden said.

The problem, he explained, is finding funding for equipment and staff. "As a medical facility, we are not allowed to charge a fee. Also since private care is not allowed, patients are not allowed to pay us."

At the same time, he said, OHIP won't fund the work of the centre, because there have not been any formal scientific studies to prove its worth.

That will change, Linden hopes, with the results of the study, which is a Level 1 study, meaning it uses the strictest technique. It is double blind (neither the patient nor the doctor knows who is getting the treatment and who is just breathing room air), patients are chosen for the study virtually at random provided they have the diagnostic criteria, and there is both a study population and a control one.

Participants will be evaluated, especially concerning their quality of life, for 18 weeks, and then by a follow-up phone call after six and 12 months, he said.

"We are hoping to set standards for treatment of those with diabetes all around the world," Linden said.

The terms of the study have been approved by the ethics committees of the University Health Network, the University of Toronto and PATH.

"If someone in the study gets worse, we will check to see if they are on oxygen. If not, we will ensure that they get the care they need."

The results should be available in two to three years, Linden said, " depending on how fast we can enrol patients."

There are some restrictions on who can take part in the study. There must be no other complicating factors, such as renal failure, and the patient must not be on dialysis. "But if they don't fit the criteria," Linden said, "they will be treated anyway."

About Nutrition

Lisa Weinberg

Q. I have noticed a lot of new drink products on the market called enhanced waters. What is in these and should I be choosing them as a healthy drink? Many seem to contain healthy vitamins.

A. This is an exploding category in the beverage market. The drinks are a cross between traditional sports drinks, calorie-free flavoured drinks and health supplement drinks and they vary significantly. First, if you are considering one, as always, read the label carefully. Some are all natural and do not have any artificial colouring, sweeteners, preservatives, etc. However, many do.

Also look at the calorie content: some of these beverages are high in calories, while others are calorie free. Make your decision based on that information, and then assess what health benefit you are gaining from them. For example, are there significant amounts of a vitamin or mineral that you are lacking? In many cases, these drinks can be a good way to stay hydrated in the hot summer and some taste good, but make sure you know what you're getting and remember that you can hydrate best with water.

Q. What do you think of the 100-calorie packs available today that have only 100 calories in each "treat"?

A. I actually think they are brilliant. They conquer one of the major problems we have today – portion control! However, we still need to limit ourselves to one pack. I think that if you love chips, cookies, chocolate, ice cream, etc., then most people can safely indulge in one per day and without the risk of going overboard. Of course, you do need to still be a smart consumer here and read the labels: some have trans fat and tons of other artificial ingredients. Remember, too, that while these can satisfy a craving, they aren't likely to fill you up, and you may still need to eat something else with it if this is your snack. Good choices would be fruit, raw vegetables, yogurt or nuts, so make sure there is room for that in your diet.

Q. I am pregnant and very nauseous. I am worried about what to eat, since I don't feel much like eating. What can I do?

A. It's hard to give advice without knowing your specific situation. You need to discuss this with your doctor, as well as how much you are vomiting. It is critical during pregnancy to ensure that you aren't dehydrated.

Assuming that you are like many women who simply feel nauseous but rarely vomit, I can offer a few tips. In pregnancy, instead of thinking you need to eat for two, think of it as eating twice as healthy. When you do feel like eating, try to eat foods that are nutrient dense. Cold foods seem to be best tolerated because you avoid significant smells; so choose cheese, yogurt, milk, fruits and vegetables.

But you also need to eat what you feel like you want. I have been through this, and I know that you will not be successful if you force yourself to eat something that turns you off. Try to find a few reliable, healthy, nutrient-dense foods and go to those. I know for me, it was cheese and crackers and cantaloupe. Most important, however, is to remember to drink as much water or other liquids as possible, especially in the hot summer.

Ex-Palmach member returns to scenes of Israel's founding

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Israel's 60th anniversary brings back special memories for Montrealer Oscar Ceausu, who, as a member of the Palmach, the elite fighting forces of the pre-state Jewish defence organization Haganah, fought during the War of Independence.

It was the thrill of his lifetime to return last year to the exact same spot in Rosh Hanikra, a town on the Lebanese border, where his brigade, called Iftah, marshalled before going off into battle.

Ceausu, who then used his birth name Barad, and a few of his mates were photographed relaxing on the day before being mobilized – to where, they did not know – in May 1948.

Ceausu, who has lived in Montreal for 47 years, went back to Israel to visit some of his 12 first cousins. They arranged to have six of Ceausu's second cousins, all currently serving in the Israel Defence Forces, to have their photo taken with Ceausu at the same site where he, as a young soldier, was photographed six decades earlier.

"To think I survived and came back so many years later to the same place and to stand with these six young men in uniform was a tremendous feeling," he said.

Born in Romania in 1932, Ceausu's relatives changed the family name to a typically Romanian one during the Nazi period. Nevertheless, the family was deported to forced-labour camps.

Twelve-year-old Oscar managed to escape and slip out of the country and, after a perilous journey, get to Italy with the help of the Aliyah Bet, which organized clandestine Jewish immigration into Palestine during the British Mandate. He was a member of the Betar Zionist youth group and grew up with the nationalist dreams of Ze'ev Jabotinsky.

"Even though I was so young, my mother begged me to make a run for it. She said, 'We will never survive.'"

Ceausu quickly learned what he needed to do to stay alive. "I lied about my age, I stole and I walked behind fat people, knowing their bodies would shield me from any bullets."

Once he arrived in Palestine, Ceausu, who had thought of becoming an actor, went on three underground missions for Aliyah Bet to Poland, posing as a non-Jew. He entered into fictitious marriages with at least five young Jewish women, all former concentration camp inmates. As the "wives" of a Palestinian national, they could enter the country legally.

On his last mission, he was caught by the British en route and was sent to Cyprus, where he remained in detention with 11,000 other Jewish men, women and children for about a year. He was freed the day before the British left Palestine, and he immediately volunteered with the Palmach.

While in detention, many young men like Ceausu secretly continued their para-military training "in preparation for a war we never knew would come. Emotions were running very high."

There were Zionist infiltrators in Cyprus who provided the detainees with their only news from the outside world.

Ceausu vividly remembers May 14, 1948, the day David Ben-Gurion declared the Jewish state's independence. "He warned us we were going to be attacked by the Arabs, that our enemies wanted to destroy us, but said that we are strong and will survive."

Tel Aviv erupted. "There were thousands in the streets of Tel Aviv celebrating. Shoshana Daman was singing a song of liberation. Everyone was screaming. There were tears of joy like you wouldn't believe. All the cafes and restaurants were not charging. The owners urged us to eat, drink," he said.

"This was the realization of my vision, which I had inherited from my mother, that the Jewish people would be revived in their homeland after thousands of years, out of the ashes, just as our national poet [Chaim Nachman] Bialik had predicted. He was a prophet who inspired us."

The euphoria was short-lived, as everyone knew it would be. But the new nation was resigned. "We had a saying – there's no choice," he said. "Two or three hours later, Syrian and Egyptian warplanes attacked."

From the Lebanese border, he was sent south to the Negev and participated in the liberation of Be'er Sheva.

After the war, Ceausu became a professional stage actor with the Ohel Theatre in Tel Aviv, which was affiliated with the Histadrut labour federation. The performed for about 15 years under the name Or Shamir.

He appeared in such Israeli plays as Moshe Shamir's All for the Best and a Hebrew version of American writer Sylvia Regan's Morning Star, and still has a cherished scrapbook full of the reviews and playbills of that time.

Ceausu said he likely would have stayed in Israel for the rest of his life, but his parents and younger sister – who survived the Holocaust – had emigrated to Montreal after living a short time in Israel. His father was a furrier, and it was a logical destination.

In 1961, when his mother was ill, he visited them. He intended to remain only a couple of weeks, but then he met the woman who would become his wife, Sema, who passed away in 1992.

Ceausu also left behind his acting career and instead went to work for his father-in-law, a manufacturer of lamps.

He returned to Israel many times over the years and still keeps his Israeli passport.

"It is my most treasured possession," he said.

Gaza invasion won't stop Qassams: Barak

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Ehud Barak admitted last week that even a large-scale Israel Defence Forces invasion of Gaza would not stop militant attacks on Israel, saying he would prefer to see the current truce remain in place.

Barak has often said that an Israeli invasion is nearing, but in an interview with Channel 10 TV he indicated even a large-scale invasion would not stop Hamas rocket attacks. Instead, he said, a seven-week-old Egyptian-mediated truce is effectively halting the barrages.

Barak also hinted at Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni's not being prime minister material, saying: "It is possible to have a prime minister without a security background. The question is what would be wise to do."

The atmosphere surrounding the Kadima party's approaching September primary has led even Barak, who is also the Labor party's chair, to break his media silence. Barak said the country had "seen this deficiency at work two years ago. Despite all the military people that sat around the cabinet table, the decisions remained controversial."

Barak spoke at length about the Second Lebanon War and its outcome, saying that the war, which was fought among other things to prevent Hezbollah from gaining strength, had in fact been a "huge leap forward for Hezbollah, like many of our previous wars."

He added that the six years preceding the war had been the quietest ever on the northern front, although the number of Katyushas in Hezbollah's arsenal had grown. "[Former prime minister Ariel] Sharon and his leadership acted wisely in not responding to Hezbollah's growing strength. We went to war unprepared and incorrectly."

Barak also said: "[Former prime minister David] Ben-Gurion said that wars should be avoided or postponed, but if they are forced on us, we must win them unequivocally, on enemy territory and quickly." The defence minister said that in his mind the right thing to do now, in the face of security threats and the impending economic recession, would be to form a national unity government. "A country's leadership has a responsibility to make decisions. This is a test I have passed."

Barak said that if the attempt to establish a national unity government failed, general elections should be held.

Regarding his 1999 negotiations with the Syrians in the United States, Barak said there was no way to conduct talks on the Middle East "without them being held in a place that will allow for talks without reporting daily to the public." According to Barak, [Syrian president] Hafez Assad tried to create a situation in which Israel "would accept his preconditions before the talks were launched, as a condition to their beginning."

Barak said he is up-to-date on the ongoing Turkish-brokered talks between Israel and Syria. However, he said that the priorities of the Syria of today are different from those of Israel, and "therefore it is impossible to hold serious negotiations."

Barak went on to say that anyone who thinks it is possible to first agree on the pre-1967 border and only then start negotiating over cutting off ties between Damascus and Tehran, ending support for Hezbollah and establishing an early warning system in the Golan, is living in cloud cuckoo land and "those in the Middle East who live in the clouds and not on the ground end up with broken limbs and not with peace."

Syria says talks progress

Syria said its indirect peace talks with Israel are making progress despite Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's impending resignation. "If the talks had not progressed, then they would have been stopped," Buthaina Shaaban, an adviser to Syrian President Bashar Assad, told reporters in reference to Turkish-mediated negotiations that were publicized in May. Asked whether Olmert's decision to step down next month could disrupt the talks, Shaaban said, "We are not concerned with whether Olmert resigns or not. We are not a party to internal Israeli issues." Syria was Israel to promise to return the Golan Heights before direct negotiations can be held. Israel, in turn, wants Syria to distance itself from Iran, Hezbollah and Hamas.

Soldiers charged

Two soldiers were indicted for shooting a bound Palestinian in the foot with a rubber bullet at point-blank range. A court-martial charged a lieutenant-colonel and a staff-sergeant with "conduct unbecoming" in connection with last month's shooting in the West Bank village of Nilin. Military sources quoted the lieutenant-colonel as saying he ordered the sergeant to cock his weapon within earshot of the man to discourage him from breaking curfew. The soldier fired the rubber bullet after having apparently misunderstood the order.

Thugs beat woman

A group of men who police believe were hired by a haredi gang recently broke into a Jerusalem woman's home and beat her because they deemed her immodest. The so-called Modesty Guard is suspected of being behind the incident. The gang has been known to unleash extortion, violence and surveillance on less religious Jews they deem sacrilegious. The incident may be one of a string of signs of rising haredi violence. Last year, five haredi Jews assaulted a woman and a soldier because they sat next to each other on a Jerusalem bus.

Music mooves cows

An Israeli dairy farmer is crediting classical music with increasing the milk production of his cows. Avraham Sindlis of Givat Haim Ihud has seen his kibbutz's cowshed move up to 11th place in Israeli milk production from 102nd in the past two years. His secret? Playing Mozart, Beethoven and Strauss to the cows. "It's pleasant for them, and for me, too, and it passes the day," Sindlis told Yediot Achronot last week. "It may be hard to prove scientifically, but the quantities of milk speak for themselves."

EU tightens Tehran sanctions

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The European Union tightened trade sanctions against Iran last Friday to punish Tehran for not committing to a longstanding demand of the international community that it freeze its nuclear enrichment program.

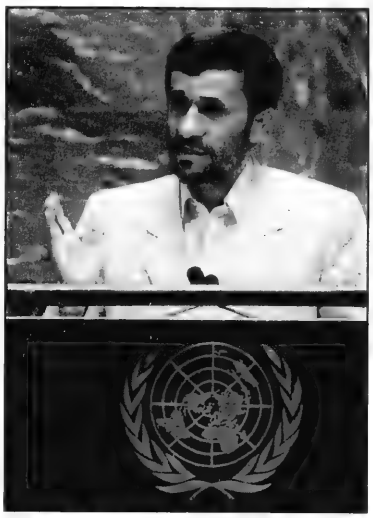
The new EU restrictions go slightly beyond existing UN trade sanctions and are designed to deny public loans or export credits to companies trading with Iran.

France, which holds the rotating EU presidency, said European governments would also carefully watch financial groups doing business with Iranian banks and step up checks on ships and airplanes travelling to Iran.

This resolution expands the range of restrictive measures adopted by the UN Security Council, in December 2006 and March 2007, an EU statement said.

The EU called on member nations to "show restraint when granting new public loans for trade with Iran… [and] to also be vigilant on activities taken by financial institutions with banks based in Iran."

Earlier last week, France and the United States said Iran's response to the international effort to defuse a dispute over its nuclear program was insufficient. They said Iran has skirted the central question of whether it's ready to halt the uranium enrichment that western nations believe will give Tehran nuclear weapons technology.



Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at the UN [RNS archive]

The new sanctions expand existing limits on trade with Iran beyond the UN Security Council's three sets of limited sanctions that monitor trade and banking. But they don't go as far as sanctions on Iran's oil and gas trade, which EU ministers threatened in June.

The European Commission separately has begun implementing the third round of UN sanctions agreed on in March. The sanctions include refusing EU visas to some Iranian officials and freezing the assets of people or companies involved in the nuclear program.

It also forbids European companies from selling some products that could help Iran build atomic weapons.

On top of that, EU countries will now inspect aircraft and ships travelling to and from Iran if they believe they are carrying contraband. France said they would focus on Iran Air Cargo and the Islamic Republic of Iran Shipping Line.

European governments will also monitor banks dealing with Bank Saderat, an Iranian bank with purported links to suspect Iranian nuclear activities.

Britain, the United States and others want to go further with their own sanctions targeting oil and gas, which could badly hit Iran's already fragile economy and would not be backed by UN Security Council members China or Russia.

Oil-rich Iran draws 80 per cent of its revenues from energy exports and is already suffering high inflation and rampant unemployment. The EU is Iran's biggest trading partner, with two-way trade totalling $39 billion (US) in 2006.

The UN Security Council's five permanent members and Germany have tried to entice Iran into suspending uranium enrichment by offering a package of economic, technological and political incentives.

Iran said Aug. 5 it would only give a clear response to this offer when it gets a direct response on questions it has about the incentives.

The United States and others accuse Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian atomic energy program. Iran denies the charge, insisting its program is peaceful, but it has so far refused to halt enriching uranium, a process that can produce the ingredients for a bomb.

Iran is under three sets of UN Security Council sanctions and could soon face a fourth unless it accepts the incentives package.

In related developments, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last Thursday refrained from saying the United States would prevent Israel from mounting an attack against Iran over the Islamic Republic's nuclear aspirations.

"We don't say yes or no to Israeli military operations. Israel is a sovereign country," Rice told Yahoo! News.

The secretary of state emphasized the importance of using diplomacy to defuse the dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

"We are in very close contact with the Israelis, and we talk about the diplomatic track that we're on," Rice said.

Her comments came a day after Iran failed to accept the incentives package meant to resolve the dispute.

In a possible reference to remarks by Israeli politicians about Jerusalem's readiness to use military means in order to prevent Iran from going nuclear, Rice added: "[Israelis] have said that diplomacy can work here, and I know they're doing their part to talk to the countries with which they have good relations to explain why it's important to have a touch edge to our diplomacy."

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, speaking in an interview published Aug. 7 in the Italian daily Corriere della Sera, said the Israel Defence Forces is preparing for an "uncompromising" victory should Iran try to attack Israel.

"We need to keep every option open," Barak said. "If they provoke us, or they attack us, our army is prepared to attack and to succeed uncompromisingly."

Barak also called on the international community to increase sanctions on Iran.

In the interview with Corriere della Sera, Barak also slammed UN Security Council Resolution 1701 – which ended the Second Lebanon War in 2006 – as ineffective, saying Syria and Iran are imposing control in Lebanon,

Meanwhile, the Israeli Air Force's anti-aircraft division carried out a large exercise on Aug. 5 to test its response to simultaneous missile strikes by Syria, Hezbollah and Iran.

The exercise began with a single Syrian missile strike on Israel.

Experts predict that a real strike would comprise multiple strikes from a number of different countries, which was what happened in the Aug. 5 exercise. The simulated Syrian attack was soon joined by missiles launched by Hezbollah and Iran.

Israel plays down Georgia ties

By ROY EITAN
JTA

TEL AVIV — As Russian and Georgian forces battle over South Ossetia, Israel finds itself on the defensive.

Though a favoured arms supplier for the former Soviet republic, the Jewish state now appears to be at pains to play down these ties rather than risk a crisis with Moscow.

It is more than just sound diplomacy.

With Russia widely expected to supply Tehran with advanced anti-aircraft missiles that could fend off a pre-emptive strike on Iranian nuclear sites, Israel has a vested interest in not appearing to be in Georgia's corner and losing whatever lobbying power it has in Moscow.

With troops, tanks and warplanes clashing in the Caucasus last weekend in the worst armed face-off Europe has seen in decades, the Russian media queried where their Georgian foes had acquired weapons and tactical wherewithal.

Israel's name came up.

The link is well known. Aside from Israel's prowess in military matters, it enjoys a personal rapport with a number of senior colleagues of Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili, who has been trying to align his country with the West.

Saakashvili's defence minister, Davit Kezerashvili, is a Jew who spent several years living in Israel. So is another cabinet minister, Temur Yakobashvili.

According to Jerusalem sources, the Georgian government, enriched by Caspian oil, has long sent emissaries on "shopping trips" to the arms firms in Israel.

In parallel, Tbilisi has used retired Israeli generals, including Israel Ziv and Gal Hirsch, as consultants on how to build up Georgian armed forces.

"The Israelis should be proud of the fact that Georgian soldiers received Israeli education and training and are fighting like I don't know what," Yakobashvili, speaking Hebrew, told Israel's Channel 10 television in a telephone interview.

The full extent of Israel's defence exports to Georgia is an official secret, but Jerusalem sources were keen to dispel the sense of a strategic alliance against Moscow.

"We have good relations with both countries and are loath to upset either," said one.

Israel's annual military dealings with Tbilisi are worth approximately $200 million a year, a defence source said, adding the figure is dwarfed by Georgian purchases from other arms suppliers such as the United States.

The Russian government has not openly accused Israel of arming its enemy, but there has been a menacing subtext to the rhetoric from Moscow.

In his speech to the UN Security Council last weekend, Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin darkly denounced the Georgian commando units' "foreign trainers."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said those who supplied Georgia with weapons should bear responsibility for the bloodshed

But Israel Radio on Sunday quoted the spokesman for the Russian Embassy in Tel Aviv as voicing satisfaction with Jerusalem's policies regarding Georgia.

Jews flee fighting

A JTA phone call to the local Jewish community centre in Gori went unanswered Sunday. Officials from the American Joint Jewish Distribution Committee were also on their way to the area to co-ordinate relief efforts, an agency official in New York said Sunday.

Also Sunday, there were reports Israel would halt arms sales and military aid to Georgia.

Ha'aretz cited an anonymous senior defence official who said Israel feared that further aid to Georgia would provoke Russia into providing more advanced weaponry to Iran and Syria.

Israel has a longstanding defence relationship with Georgia and over the years has sold rockets, night vision and aerial drones to the former Soviet republic. A drone that was shot down by Russian forces in the breakway republic of Abkhazia earlier this year came from Israel.

Georgian troops withdrew Sunday from South Ossetia as Russian forces pressed near to the Georgian border of the enclave. According to estimates from the Georgian and Russian governments, the death toll for the conflict is almost 2,000.

Some 1,000 Jewish families once lived in the disputed Ossetia capital of Tskhinvali, but that number has dwindled to the single digits in the past two decades as internecine conflict ravaged the area.

Regional groups haven't been able to reach the few Jews still left in Ossetia, the Jewish Agency said.

Between 10,000 and 12,000 Jews live in Georgia, mostly in Tbilisi.

The conflict showed no signs of easing Sunday and looked to be spreading to Abkhazia, on Georgia's Black Sea border. Russian forces have not indicated whether they intend to push past Georgia's border.

The drift toward all-out war with Georgia is the largest international clash for Russian armed forces in more than 20 years. War planes bombed deep in Georgian territory, hitting oil pipelines and the Tblisi airport, Georgia's interior ministry said, according to Interfax.

Gori had been used as a staging ground for Georgian troops during their initial offensive on the Ossetian capital.

Georgian officials have called for a ceasefire and asked for peace talks to resolve the situation in South Ossetia. Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili and former Russian president Vladimir Putin have called the conflict a war and sought to sway international public opinion in their direction as the conflict unfolded last weekend.

Russian media reports on state-controlled television have described a genocide in South Ossetia by the Georgians, while Saakashvili has sought to characterize the conflict as an incursion on Georgian soil by Russian aggressors.

Since 1989, 23,287 people have immigrated to Israel from Georgia under the auspices of the Jewish Agency.

JEWISH SURVIVORS OF NAZI SIEGE OF LENINGRAD: CLAIMS CONFERENCE OBTAINS ONE-TIME PAYMENTS

Certain Jewish survivors of the Nazi siege of Leningrad may now be eligible for one-time payments from the Claims Conference, due to recent negotiations with the German government.

As a result of recent amendments to the Hardship Fund obtained by the Claims Conference, certain Jewish persons who stayed in Leningrad at some time between September 1941 and January 1944 or fled from there during this period may receive a one-time Hardship Fund payment of €2,556, if they meet the other requirements of the Hardship Fund.

Eligible persons must have suffered "considerable damage to health." "Considerable damage to health" may be proven by demonstrating the applicant's earning capacity was generally reduced by 80% or 50% as a result of persecution, at the date of filing of the application. Please Note: this requirement applies only if the applicant is under the age of 60 (for women) or 65 (for men) at the date of filing of the application. Female persecutees aged 60 or older and male persecutees aged 65 and older are deemed to suffer from a reduction of earning capacity of 80% and do not have to prove having suffered considerable damage to health.

This ad is only an outline of the change in criteria and does not govern eligibility. The full eligibility criteria for the Hardship Fund can be found at www.claimscon.org. Please note that no second applications can be made to the Hardship Fund. Heirs are not able to apply to the Hardship Fund.

The Hardship Fund, established in 1980, has paid more than $850 million to nearly 320,000 Jewish victims of Nazism. The Claims Conference has continuously negotiated with Germany for changes to the program's eligibility criteria in order to be able to pay additional Nazi victims.

Advocates are not giving up

About a year and a half ago, advocates for Ethiopian aliyah announced that another 8,000 Ethiopians had migrated from their rural villages to Gondar, where Jewish aid compounds are located, and demanded that they be processed for aliyah. They were extended aid services by the main Jewish aid group operating in Ethiopia, the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ).

But Israel's Interior Ministry refused to screen the new group for eligibility to immigrate, arguing that they were not covered by the government's 2003 decision. Advocates for the Ethiopians challenged the ministry's position in court, but Israel's Supreme Court ruled in favour of the ministry, finding that the group – which by this spring had swelled to 8,700 – represented new petitioners.

The court recommended, however, that the government review the eligibility of some 1,400 of the petitioners, and several weeks ago Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed in principle with that recommendation.

That means, in essence, that Ethiopian aliyah still isn't over.

"There was no event because an event would have made a statement that aliyah is over," Michael Jankelowitz, a spokesperson for the Jewish Agency, which carries out the government decisions on Ethiopian aliyah, said after last week's flight arrived. "The issue of aliyah from Ethiopia is not a closed book yet, so there's no need to have a ceremony."

The debate surrounding the immigration of the Falash Mora – Ethiopians claiming links to people whose Jewish ancestors converted to Christianity a century ago to escape economic and social pressures, but who now are returning to Judaism and petitioning to immigrate to Israel – has been influenced by the frequent fluctuations in the number said to be left in Ethiopia.

Skeptics point to the frequent additions to those numbers as signs that non-Jewish Ethiopians are deceptively claiming links to Ethiopians of Jewish descent and exploiting lax Israeli immigration regulations to escape Africa's desperate poverty for the relative comfort of the Jewish state.

Israeli ministers, Jewish aid officials and members of Israel's own Ethiopian Jewish community are among the skeptics, and they have been behind efforts to quantify and cap the aliyah of the Falash Mora.

"We are creating a hell of a job for ourselves because of political correctness or trying to be nice," Israel's interior minister Meir Sheetrit told the Jerusalem Post in a 2007 interview.

Echoing sentiments frequently voiced in Israel, Sheetrit expressed fears that the aliyah would never finish. He also cast aspersions on the Falash Mora's Jewishness, calling them Christians.

Advocates, however, claim that the vast majority of those petitioning to immigrate to Israel have legitimate links to Jewish ancestry and are genuinely returning to Jewish practices, not simply adopting Jewish observances in a bid to immigrate. Many advocates say Israel's reticence to accept the Falash Mora stems from racial bias – a charge Israeli officials reject.

Advocates are not giving up on their effort for the group of 8,700, saying Israel should review their applications for aliyah to determine their eligibility instead of refusing to consider them outright. They have lined up a number of high-profile figures behind their cause, including former Israeli Supreme Court justice Meir Shamgar, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz and Canadian parliamentarian Irwin Cotler.

They are also lobbying Knesset members. Last month, the 120-member parliament passed two non-binding resolutions in favour of the 8,700 petitioners, by votes of 44-1 and 43-1. The resolutions have no legal power.

Some of the fiercest advocates for Ethiopian aliyah are in the United States. North American Jewish federations, including its umbrella organization, the United Jewish Communities (UJC), have pressed the Israeli government to accept Ethiopian immigrants and bankrolled NACOEJ's work.

But with the aliyah begun in 2003 now complete, and the Interior Ministry and Supreme Court saying the government has fulfilled its pledges, American Jewish support for the aliyah has dwindled.

UJC fell nearly $30 million short of its $100-million fundraising goal for Ethiopian aliyah and absorption as part of Operation Promise, a three-year effort that launched in 2005. In June, the UJC announced that its Ethiopia-related funds had been exhausted.

That cut funding for NACOEJ's aid programs in Ethiopia by some $68,000 per month. Several big-city federations supportive of Ethiopian aliyah were informed of UJC's cut and advised to pick up the slack if possible, but NACOEJ says the shortfall has forced the closure of the group's food program in Gondar for young mothers and their children.

A UJC official told JTA that the umbrella group might be willing to consider resuming funding in Ethiopia, depending on the humanitarian situation.

For now, it's not clear when Israel will begin reviewing the 1,400 petitioners for their eligibility to make aliyah. And though Israeli officials have no obligation to bring the remainder of the 8,700 people said to be left in Gondar, advocates insist they will not give up their fight.

"The reality is stronger than people like Sheetrit," said Avraham Neguise, the director of South Wing to Zion, an Ethiopian Israeli advocacy group. "If everyone is afraid of 8,000 today, in another few years we can bring more. The longer they stay there, the more Israel will have to bring."

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Singer-songwriter's catchy tunes stick in your head

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

As soon as she started playing the piano at the age of six, Tamara Miller was hooked.

Even on holidays, if she finds herself in a piano lounge she can't resist the temptation to start playing.

"That's who I am," the 29-year-old Toronto singer-songwriter says. "When I'm in hotel lobbies or whenever I see a piano, I feel like I need a dose of music.

"I've done this in many places like Israel and Italy. Once in an art gallery in Venice I started playing on a piano and found out later that Frank Sinatra played there. It was very inspiring."

Even in her sleep, she can't get away from her music. Miller often finds herself writing in her dreams. "I wake up and force myself to write the song down and play it on the keyboards."

Miller recently independently released her first CD, a collection of six short piano-based pop songs called 60 Seconds.

You Made Me See The Light is a perfect example of her knack for writing uplifting, catchy melodies that can compete with anything on contemporary pop radio stations.

The EP opens with the fast-paced Now That You Found Me, which blends Sarah McLachlan and Chantal Kreviazuk in Miller's own unique way.

The last song, Maybe, is a ballad with an equally catchy hook that sticks in your head for hours and showcases her faultlessly beautiful voice.

Lyrically, her songs are positive and inspiring, even if the ideas spring from the dark side of relationships.

"I like to write words of encouragement and look at the positive side of things," she says. "To see something like breaking up as a positive experience. If there's a theme in my work, it's to go after your dreams and stay strong.

"I try to be honest in my lyrics, and hopefully the audience connects with them 'cause they've been through similar things. At my CD release, people were actually crying."

After obtaining her bachelor of education, Miller started teaching music (she taught Jewish music for a while at United Synagogue Day School – "we did all the holiday songs," she says). She recently cut down to part-time teaching in order to focus on her music.

"As a supply teacher, it gives me the flexibility to make a living and pursue my career," she says.

It was while pursuing her fine arts degree at York University that Miller fell in love with songwriting. As a school project, she had to write and produce her own song. "I got the chills afterwards. I realized it was something I love to do. It was lots of fun. It was an epiphany, a light bulb went off in my head – I've got to pursue this, I thought. I didn't choose it. It's like it chose me."

Miller wrote all the songs on her EP, produced by Ron Lopata, whose vast resumé includes working with Ron Sexsmith, Our Lady Peace, Ashley MacIsaac and the Juno Award-winning artist Jacksoul.

The EP title, 60 Seconds, comes from the title of one of her favourite songs on the CD, which on one level is about leaving a relationship but realizing that all works out well in the end.

On another level, the album title is about her innate ability to discern things instantly. "I feel I'm a very intuitive person and tend to know rather quickly – 60 Seconds, so to speak – whether a song I wrote is going to work and give you that 'chill factor.'"

The cover of 60 Seconds shows her standing on an empty beach with a 60-second stopwatch faintly in the foreground.

"I thought the song 60 Seconds was a great concept for the cover. I like the way the clock was portrayed with me on the beach representing time and my own journey, where I was, where I came from and where I am going."

The empty beach also represents one of her major sources of inspiration. "I love to travel. I'm inspired by water and open spaces. When I'm travelling, I'm out of my comfort zone and it helps me to clear my head and keep me on track."

60 Seconds is getting regular rotation on campus and community radio stations out west and on the University of Toronto's CIUT.

Tamara Miller looks at the positive side of things.

TAMARA MILLER

60 Seconds

"I've had some really good feedback, but I have to keep on banging on doors and keep pursuing it," she says. "If you're just a dreamer, it's not going to work. It's not enough to sit down in your bedroom and write songs. I'm writing all the time, going to gigs and connecting with other artists and networking all the time. I'm also co-writing songs, which opens up a lot of doors for me."

Attending gigs is also another source of inspiration.

"I'm really inspired after a live show, seeing an act I can relate to, especially one with piano-driven sounds," she says. She likes to write very early in the morning or late at night. "I do really well late at night – I'm a bit of a night owl. I light some candles and feel really at ease and peaceful in that zone."

Currently, Miller is working hard trying to showcase her CD and "get it out there." She hopes to go out west, where her CD is getting radio play, and play small-town gigs and festivals.

She will perform songs from 60 Seconds and more in Toronto at the Cameron House on Queen St. W. on Aug. 22 at 9:30 p.m.

You can sample her songs at www.myspace.com/tamaramiller and visit her website at http://tamaramiller.coffeehouse.ca

60 Seconds is available on iTunes, amazon.ca, puretracks.com and hmv.ca

The Flying Bulgars give klezmer a modern twist

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

For 20 years, the Flying Bulgars have been melding Yiddish tradition with jazz improvisation, all the while growing and changing musically.

Performing at this year's Ashkenaz Festival, the band is adding English vocals to the mix.

"After 20 years of loving and playing Yiddish music and doing songs in Yiddish, we wanted to see what happened if we opened ourselves up to English," said trumpeter, composer and band founder David Buchbinder.

"It's not that we're tired of Yiddish, but we had stuff we wanted to express, we had songs waiting to be written. We wanted to reach a wide range of people."

The Flying Bulgars, which is co-led by Buchbinder and vocalist Dave Wall, has played an important role in the revival of klezmer music. After years of instrumentals, the band's new album, which will be out by the end of the year, concentrates more on vocals and lyrics.

"Most of the songs are now actually songs," Buchbinder said. "All these years of being instrumental, I'm excited to be involved in something that will reach people directly, hopefully deeply. For most people, having poetry and music together makes it much more personal. It allows them to bring music into their own lives."

Another first for the band is the amount of collaboration between Wall and Buchbinder. What came out of this collaboration was a contemporary folk/alternative style with a bittersweet mix of darkness and light.

David Buchbinder

"There's one song which is a satirical look at the issue of folk music as a consumer item. There are songs that are informed by the situation in the Middle East," he said.

Before beginning to compose, both Buchbinder and Wall sat down and wrote short stories.

"The songs aren't random, they came out of a creative process. We wrote some stories just to give us something to start writing from. It gave us a lot of images," Buchbinder said, adding that the stories were rooted in Judaism. "It's a Jewish band so that was the way our minds went."

Buchbinder, one of the founders of the Ashkenaz festival, admits that his music may be going in a more modern direction, although the instrumentals are still rooted in the past.

"The instrumentals may have gotten a little more traditionally inspired. It used to be a lot more extreme jazz experimentation, but personally, I don't need to do that in the band anymore."

Eric Stein, the festival's artistic director, said that he's seeing a contemporary move in the klezmer music scene.

"I know that [Buchbinder's] goal has been to try to take it in a more contemporary kind of direction. A lot of people are doing that, a number of artists in the klezmer music scene are making music out of English lyrics. It says more about contemporary impulses by a number of musicians working in this world to make it accessible," Stein said.

This year, the festival will offer several acts that appeal to a younger generation.

"I've put a slightly stronger emphasis on putting in more programming for kids and families. We realize that the future of this thing really depends on the next generation," Stein said.

Some of this programming includes Nayekhovichi, a hard-rock klezmer group from Russia, and Abraham Inc., a Jewish funk band.

Buchbinder believes that the Flying Bulgars' new songs will appeal to younger audiences.

"For people who have never heard of the band, especially younger people, there's a lot of stuff they can get into and appreciate," he said. "I think the music is compelling. The songs are really interesting, they're very accessible and engaging and they've got some edge to them."

Like all of the Flying Bulgars' music, the new songs are rooted in Jewish traditions.

"Anybody coming [to the festival] to hear some Jewish music will not be disappointed. In the middle of a Yiddish festival, I'm very proud of these tunes. I like the stuff we've come up with," Buchbinder said, adding that the festival is perfect for connecting with Jewish culture.

"The festival as a whole is the best place to check in, spend all weekend and soak it in. I see there are a lot of great artists. It's a great chance to immerse [in Yiddish culture.]"

The Flying Bulgars perform at the Ashkenaz Festival on Aug. 30 at 7 p.m, and the show is free. For more information, visit www.harbourfrontcentre.com.

Festival's former artistic directer launches a CD at Ashkenaz

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

While performing at Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival in 2006, singer Mitch Smolkin, the festival's artistic director at the time, found the band with which he wanted to record a CD.

"While I was saying goodbye as the Ashkenaz artistic director, there was an intimate moment when I got on stage to perform with [Marcelo] Moguilevsky and [Cesar] Lerner from Buenos Aires and Boris Sihon from British Columbia, who I brought together because individually they were incredible musicians," Smolkin says.

Smolkin is launching A Song Is Born, the CD he recorded with these musicians, at this year's Ashkenaz Festival on Aug. 30 at 7 pm in the Enwave Theatre at Harbourfront Centre.

Smolkin had toyed with the idea of making a Yiddish album for a few years, and after he performed with the musicians in 2006, it came together. "Then all of a sudden everything finally made sense. I've been thinking about [the CD] for five or six years. I was in the studio twice, about to record an album and decided in both cases it wasn't the right direction," he says.

"Then when I knew what musicians I wanted to play with, I ended up choosing songs that were formative for me in the genre of Yiddish music."

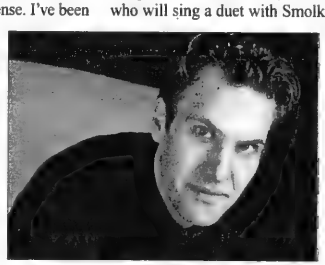
Musicians featured on the CD include Moguilevsky and Lerner of Klezmer en Buenos Aires; Berlin-based trumpeter Paul Brody; percussionist Sihon; vocalist Aviva Chernick; and guitarist Levon Ichkhanian, who produced the album. They will perform with Smolkin at Harbourfront.

Song selection for the album began two years ago. Smolkin chose songs that told stories that are aspects of his life and the lives of others who preceded him.

Unter Dayne Vayse Shtern (Under Your White Starry Heaven) a song by Abraham Sutzkever about being an exile, connects Smolkin to his late grandfather, who was an orphan left after World War II.

"My grandfather could never talk about it [his experience], so I would tell the audience, and ostensibly my grandfather… that because he could not tell me his story, I would sing about how desperate he was to find nobody left."

Smolkin will perform all 13 tracks from The Song Is Born, including two original songs. One is by Winnipeg composer Sid Rabinovitch, the other by Moguilevsky, who will sing a duet with Smolkin at Harbourfront.



Mitch Smolkin

Toronto singer Chernick, the backup vocalist on the album, will also perform a solo.

"Our sound is ground in melody – that's very important. People will hear definite melodic influences, but [the music] also incorporates a lot of the strengths of the musicians and draws from a whole array of musical influences to produce a sound that's very refreshing," Smolkin says.

The group's sound includes jazz and a choral piece with classical underpinnings, as well as featuring the didgeridoo – an Australian aboriginal wind instrument. Armenian guitarist Ichkhanian brings Middle Eastern influences to the mix.

Smolkin says it made sense to come back to Ashkenaz as an artist, "to give my gift in a different way. It's very important that it comes full circle and I release the album at Ashkenaz."

Concert tickets are $18 in advance and $25 at the door. Contact the Harbourfront Centre box office at 416-973-4000 or online at www.harbourfrontcentre.com. Smolkin's website address is www.mitchsmolkin.com.

EARLY NOVEL BY MORLEY TORGOV WINS PRIZE IN ITALY

At age 80, Toronto author and lawyer Morley Torgov has taken a new direction with his sixth novel Murder in A-Major (RendezVous Crime). It is the first of a mystery series set in the world of classical music. The book was released in Canada in June, and French- and Greek-language rights have also been sold.

Torgov's classic 1982 novel The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick was recently published in Italian and has won Italy's Adei-Wizo Prize, worth 600 euros. Torgov, who still practises law as he writes the second mystery in the new series, will have to tear himself away from his busy schedule if he wishes to attend the awards ceremony in Turin in late October.

The Wrestler from Montreal: Arnold Holtzman grew up on the streets that come to life in his new novel, The Wrestler from Montreal. He lived in the midst of the Jewish immigrant population that came penniless to Montreal in the early 1900s. His book salutes this generation.

After graduating from college in Montreal, Holtzman moved to Israel and established a rose nursery devoted to hybridizing new garden varieties. Eventually he returned to academic studies and published two textbooks on genetics-related subjects. He speaks of The Wrestler from Montreal as his richest creative experience. The book is available at bookstores and online. www.montrealwrestler.com

Documentary Nominated: Kike Like Me, a feature documentary by Toronto native Jamie Kastner, is up for a Grierson, the British documentary award, in the category of most entertaining documentary.

Produced and directed by Kastner, the provocatively titled black comic road movie is essentially about Jewish identity. Kike Like Me follows Kastner's continent-hopping journey to find out what it means to be perceived as Jewish nowadays. Along the way he gets booted from Pat Buchanan's Virginia mansion, almost starts a riot outside Paris and enjoys a bitter hot dog lunch at Auschwitz.

The doc earned top audiences and considerable media attention at the Hot Docs International Documentary Festival in April 2007. It has since been screened at festivals from Sao Paulo to Berlin and was recently picked "audience favourite" at the Munich Dokfest. It's also been widely shown on television, including on TVOntario. The Griersons are named after the Scottish-born filmmaker John Grierson, founder of the National Film Board of Canada.

Abraham Inc. at Ashkenaz: One of the centrepieces of the upcoming Ashkenazi Festival is Abraham Inc., a new 10-piece supergroup that has already performed at such venues as Carnegie Hall, France's Transmusical de Rennes Festival and Harlem's historic Apollo Theater. Consisting of klezmer clarinettist David Krakauer, funk trombonist and arranger Fred Wesley and Canadian Yiddish hip-hop renegade Socalled, the band "stretches across musical and racial boundaries to create the most sophisticated and explosive fusion of Jewish music with hardcore funk ever produced."

Abraham Inc. releases its debut CD at its première concert at Ashkenaz, Thursday, Aug. 28, 8 p.m., Sirius Stage, Harbourfront Centre. $18 advance, $25 door. Ashkenaz runs Aug. 26 to Sept. 1 at Harbourfront and various other locations.

Lufthansa celebrates 40 years operating in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For the past seven years, Lufthansa, Germany's national airline, has been the largest foreign carrier serving Israel.

Lufthansa – which started flying to Israel 40 years ago come November – wrested that honour away from British Airways a year into the second Palestinian uprising, said Lufthansa's communications manager in Israel, Tal Muscal, in an an interview in Tel Aviv last month.

As tourism to Israel plummeted with the eruption of the intifadah in September 2000, foreign airlines reduced their service to Ben-Gurion Airport.

Lufthansa, a global airline that flies to 192 destinations in 78 countries, including 20 North American gateways, resisted the trend.

"We took a calculated risk to continue our flights to Israel," said Muscal, a former Jerusalem Post reporter who covered aviation and tourism.

"We've stayed in Israel during difficult times," noted Muscal, saying that Lufthansa continued flying to Tel Aviv during the 1991 Gulf War, when Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel.

Although it was a late comer to the Jewish state, commencing service on Nov. 3, 1968, three years after Israel established diplomatic relations with what was then West Germany, Lufthansa has become a major force in Israel's vital tourist industry.

Today, Lufthansa offers 14 weekly flights from Frankfurt to Tel Aviv, seven morning flights using an Airbus 340-300 and a daily afternoon flight using a Boeing 747-400.

The 3½-hour flight to and from Israel does not serve pork, and the menu in the business class section is printed in German, English and Hebrew.

"We carry about 1,600 people to and from Israel every day," said Muscal, noting that Lufthansa's market share currently stands at 4.2 per cent.

El Al, Israel's national carrier, is the premier airline serving Israel, with a market share varying from 37 per cent to 40 per cent.

By contrast, Continental is the largest American airline servicing Israel.

Air Canada is absent from the list of the top-10 airlines flying to and from Israel, said Muscal.

Last year, Lufthansa carried 402,000 passengers to Israel, compared to 366,600 in 2006, 363,000 in 2005 and 361,000 in 2004.

Last month, Lufthansa and CAL, the Israeli credit card company, launched a credit card for frequent flyers.

In its first year of operation, when it offered a grand total of two weekly flights to Israel, Lufthansa carried 1,200 passengers to Ben-Gurion Airport.

Since then, Lufthansa has flown some eight million passengers between Germany and Israel.

"For us, the 40th anniversary of our operations in Israel is a real milestone," said Muscal. "When you look at our growth, it's a real success story. It's a profitable route for us and one we are trying to expand."

Last November, Lufthansa requested permission from the Israel Civil Aviation Authority to resume flights from Munich to Tel Aviv.

Lufthansa offers 14 weekly flights to Israel. [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

The route was suspended in 2003 following a drop in German tourism to Israel, Muscal said, adding that Lufthansa plans to restart it once Israel and Germany sign a new aviation agreement.

Three years ago, Lufthansa hired a manager to expand incoming tourist and business traffic to Israel from its worldwide gateways. The person in question, Uri Amiram, began his career at Lufthansa's Jerusalem office in 1987.

"We're the only foreign airline with a manager who encourages tourism to Israel," said Muscal.

According to his figures, approximately 20 per cent of tourists using Lufthansa fly to Israel from its gateways outside Europe, and more than 60 per cent of its passengers on Israel-bound flights are non-Israelis.

In 2000, one of Israel's best years for tourism, some 250,000 Germans visited Israel, much to the benefit of its economy and its pivotal relationship with Germany.

Muscal said that, in promoting Israeli tourism, Lufthansa continually brings travel agents, tour operators and journalists to Israel.

From the outset, Lufthansa has tried to serve as a bridge between Israel and Germany, fully recognizing that Germany's central role in planning and implementing the Holocaust still casts a giant shadow over German-Jewish relations.

With this in mind, Lufthansa has sponsored many cultural events in Israel. It has flown the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to Tel Aviv and enabled the Pina Bausch dance company from Wupperal, Germany, to perform in Israel.

Lufthansa also sponsored a Marc Chagall exhibit at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem and funded an exhibition of the works of Alfred Eisenstadt, the German-born father of photo-journalism whose photographs graced the pages of Life magazine.

As well, Lufthansa has supported environmental projects in Israel, funding the satellite tracking of migrating cranes, Lufthansa's corporate symbol.

Each year, an estimated five million cranes fly over Israel's Hula Valley on the way to Europe and Africa.

One of the world's largest airlines, Lufthansa flies out of its hub at Frankfurt airport, which recently inaugurated a new passenger handling area between concourses C and D in terminals 1 and 2.

Frankfurt airport, a gleaming maze of interconnected buildings, has the only airport synagogue in Europe, according to Lufthansa.

Located in Terminal 2, opposite gate D4, the shul, with blue wall-to-wall carpeting, 16 chairs, a table with a brass menorah and a few prayer books on a shelf, is open 24 hours a day. It is close to Christian Orthodox, Protestant, Catholic and Muslim prayer rooms.

Sheldon Kirshner flew with Lufthansa from Toronto to Israel via Frankfurt. Between flights, he stayed one night at the Sheraton Hotel at Frankfurt Airport.

Insider's view of America's role in Mideast peacemaking

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Aaron David Miller was an integral member of the United States State Department team, led by Dennis Ross, that tried to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict.

From the Madrid conference to the Oslo peace process, Miller was in the thick of things, working for Democratic and Republican administrations alike as he and his colleagues attempted to achieve reconciliation between Israel and the Palestinians and Israel and Syria.

Aaron David Miller

Miller, a Jew who regards himself as an American "who happened to be Jewish, not the other way around," was involved in these herculean diplomatic efforts for 15 years.

Having resigned in 2003, he has now written an important and revealing book about U.S. diplomacy in the Middle East. The Much Too Promised Land: America's Elusive Search For Arab-Israeli Peace (Bantam Books) will be of interest particularly to readers who have paid attention to the permutations of peacemaking in that region.

Prior to the 1991 Madrid conference, which he claims "legitimized" Arab-Israeli negotiations, he was a skeptic. "I was always negative, ever cynical that American diplomacy could overcome the dead weight of generations of conflict," admits Miller, now affiliated with the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars. "Middle East diplomacy seemed to be for dreamers..."

Miller's views changed profoundly once the Madrid conference was convened. But in the wake of the second Palestinian uprising and the collapse of the Oslo talks in 2001, he was subjected to a cold dose of reality.

Having been chastened, Miller is more cautious today. "That I'm suspended now somewhere between despair and hope is not all that surprising given the turn of events," he writes soberly. "It's probably where I should have been all along."

He has learned the hard way that the primary responsibility for peacemaking rests with Israel and the Arabs, not with the United States. Washington, nevertheless, has a key role to play. "We can't produce peace… but we can help to diminish conflict, defuse crises and broker political agreements…"

In The Much Too Promised Land, Miller offers a keen analysis of the Oslo talks and Israel's tortuous negotiations with Syria.

For Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, Oslo was a trade-off. As Miller puts it, "In exchange for recognizing him as the only Palestinian partner for Israel and America, he agreed to an interim process that deferred big issues like Jerusalem and refugees."

Miller believes that the logic of Oslo was sound. Interim accords would enhance mutual confidence and trust and prompt the Israelis and Palestinians to address permanent status issues such as borders and settlements. But this never happened, despite three false starts in 1996 and 1999.

He blames both sides for Oslo's ultimate failure. Arafat never abandoned violence as a tool, nor did he crack down on terrorism and arrest terrorists. In addition, the Palestinian Authority-controlled media generated anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic propaganda. Israel continued to build settlements, confiscate land and impose closures on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

In retrospect, he thinks, Washington should have been tougher with Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"I don't recall a single, tough, honest conversation in which we said to the Israelis, 'Look, settlements may not violate the letter of Oslo, but they're wreaking havoc with its spirit and compromising the logic of a gradual process of building trust and confidence.'"

He concedes that the United States was also too easy on the Palestinians. "By any standard, we should have been far tougher with [Arafat] on violence, terror, incitement, the absence of rule of law, transparency of governance and honest fiscal management of Palestinian institutions." Washington, too, did not retaliate when Arafat "indulged" Hamas and Islamic Jihad, he adds.

He has high praise for Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli prime minister who ushered in Oslo. Rabin was a great leader who combined courage, caution and pragmatism. Arafat, however, failed his interlocutors and his people, he notes.

In Miller's judgment, Rabin's assassination accelerated Olso's demise. "Had Rabin lived, the crisis triggered by Oslo's flaws would still have come, but it would probably have been less severe."

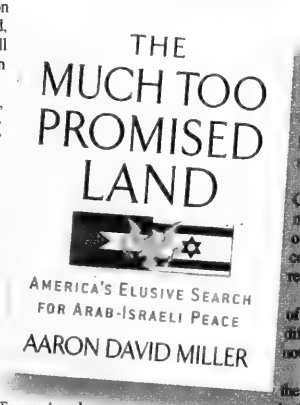
He has cool words for Rabin's successors, Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak. Netanyahu's policies were "erratic and often obstinate." As for Barak, he moved too quickly, jettisoning Rabin's gradualism too abruptly.

His appraisal of the ill-fated Camp David summit in 2000 is clear-headed. Arafat bears "a huge responsibility" for its failure, but Israel is at fault as well. Barak offered Arafat about 90 per cent of the West Bank, but Arafat wanted nearly 100 percent, what Israel was apparently prepared to give the Syrians, on the Golan Heights.

In analyzing Israel's talks with Syria, which unfolded between 1991 and 1996 and again from1999 to 2000, Miller is rather critical of Hafez Assad, the then-Syrian president. "To me, Assad, whom I dubbed 'the Frank Sinatra of the peace process,' wanted to make peace 'his own way.' This meant getting more than [Anwar] Sadat and giving less. The Egyptians got the international border; Assad wanted the June 4, 1967, lines."

And Assad, at least in the early stages of the negotiations, had no real intention of normalizing relations with Israel, Miller suggests. "Assad seemed to want us simply to deliver the Golan to Syria. Forget cold peace. In 1993, his idea of the future with Israel looked like a blizzard."

Once the Palestinian track was activated, he goes on to say, the prospects of signing a peace treaty with Syria faded. "Rabin's Oslo deal… made any agreement to withdraw from the Golan almost unthinkable while Israel was giving up territory to the Palestinians."



Miller, whose first boss was James Baker, the secretary of state, says that while he was not a grand strategist like Henry Kissinger, he had a knack for recognizing opportunities. Baker was smart and brilliant at times. He was a showman who honed his negotiating skills through humour, emotional reactions and a no-nonsense persona.

As for former U.S. president Bill Clinton, he "cared more about and invested more time and energy in Arab-Israeli peace over a longer period than any of his predecessors." And he revered Rabin, whom he regarded as a teacher and father figure.

In closing, Miller says that the attainment of Arab-Israeli peace will be "excruciatingly difficult, painful and time-consuming," but not impossible.

"What stands in the way of a solution is the absence of political will and leadership on both sides to understand what's necessary to meet the other side's needs and to take the political decisions to move forward," he observes in a trenchant comment.

He is convinced that a resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute would be of benefit to the United States. "It is now more vital to our national interests and to our security, than at any time since the late 1940s."

Are presumptive presidential candidates Barack Obama and John McCain listening?

CONGREGATION WELCOMES A NEW TORAH: Jack Kalb, seen under the chupah carrying a new sefer Torah, is greeted by sifrei Torah from Congregation Kahal Yereim. Kalb, his wife, Edie, along with family, friends and community members, donated the Torah in memory of Jack and Edie's son, Brian Kalb, who died suddenly last year at 32. Brian Kalb was popular for the warmth and encouragement he showed young people. Funds raised that were not needed for the Torah or its ornaments will be used to create two annual scholarships for Orthodox day school students who need academic and financial assistance. Bathurst Street near Glencairn Avenue was closed to accommodate the estimated 300 people who joined the procession to welcome the new Torah. [Mani Melnick photo]

Gospel singer to kick off Winnipeg CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg has announced that black Jewish gospel singer Josh Nelson will be the featured performer at this year's annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign kick-off evening on Sept. 7.

Nelson refers to his musical style as "kosher gospel." While gospel music is identified with Christianity, Nelson points out on his website that the origins of gospel music go back to Africa and slavery.

"Gospel originated in work songs sung by African slaves," he says on the site.

He notes that while most of the slaves became Christian, some reverted to Islam after emancipation and a few became Jewish. He himself grew up in a black Jewish synagogue in New York. While he considers himself Orthodox and grew up in a family that kept kosher, he notes that he is sympathetic to the Reform movement. He studied at both the Hebrew Union College and Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and he teaches Hebrew to Middle Years students at a Hebrew school in New York in addition to his musical endeavours.

Nelson, 25, discovered gospel when he was eight years old. He came across a record by Mahalia Jackson at his zaida's house. He recorded with Jackson when he was 13. Since then, he has performed worldwide with many great performers, including, Aretha Franklin and Wynton Marsalis, Cab Calloway and Dizzy Gillespie, as well as klezmer groups and prominent Christian gospel singers.

In 2001, he was the subject of a documentary, Keep On Walking, which has been featured at numerous Jewish film festivals.

Nelson sees no contradiction between gospel music and Judaism. He says that what he has done is add soul to traditional Jewish liturgical music.

The target for this year's CJA campaign is $5.5 million, up $250,000 from last year.

"We have kept our targeted increase smaller than in recent years," says Rael Ludwig, the chair of the 2008 campaign. "That's because we have several large capital campaigns in the community over the past couple of years," he said, citing the Rady Jewish Community Centre and Sharon Home (for Jewish seniors) expansions, and the Canadian Museum for Human Rights that was conceived by the late community leader Israel Asper.

"Many of the same donors have been approached for the different campaigns."

Ludwig, a lawyer, has been an active member of the federation for several years.

"I have filled a number of federation executive positions," he said. "I felt that it was time for me to chair the CJA campaign, so I volunteered."

The target for the CJA's Women's Campaign this year is $1.175 million, which is included in the overall $5.5 million campaign target. Sharon Allentuck is chairing it for the second year in a row. Allentuck is a past national chair of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada's Israel Family Counselling Association fundraising project.

CHAT grad heading to U.S. college on golf scholarship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If you check the PGA's statistics, you'll find the longest hitters are not necessarily the most successful golfers.

It's pretty much the same on the ladies' tour – with one notable exception – and that should suit Stephanie Klein just fine.

Stephanie Klein

At 5-4 and all of 112 pounds, she's not strong enough to be long, so she's learned to rely on other aspects of her game to shoot low scores. Her success depends on accuracy, course management and mental toughness – the qualities that earned her a partial athletic scholarship to the University at Albany-SUNY, which she'll begin later this month.

Klein, who graduated last June from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is a competitive golfer who ranks among the best in her age group in Ontario.

A few weeks ago at the Ontario junior girls championship, which attracted the best young golfers from across the country, she finished 15th in a field of 70.

At the four-round Toronto Star Amateur, she finished 22nd in a field of 110, losing 2-1 in match play to the eventual tournament winner. Later, at the Investor Group Ontario Women's Amateur championship, which included adult golfers, she finished 38th in a field of 110.

More recently at the CN Future Links Atlantic Championship at the Gowan Brae Golf Club in Bathurst, N.B., she was in second place after two rounds, but on the third and final day, she shot six over after only eight holes.

Shaking off that poor start, she pulled herself together and played the rest of the round one over, resulting in a second-place finish. Her average score over three rounds was 79, seven over par.

Klein attributes her comeback to "mental toughness and focus."

Last year, Klein was ranked 88th in the Royal Canadian Golf Association's Order of Merit standings for junior girls. This year she's moved up to 45th.

Her improvement is certainly not due to long hits from the tee. Klein, 17, admits to hitting her drives only about 200 yards, far short of most of her competitors.

"It's a little frustrating to be short," because she needs long irons to reach the green when her competitors are pulling an eight iron out of the bag, she said.

Klein makes up for that lack of distance by stressing accuracy and a strong short game. She estimates she hits 12 of 18 greens in regulation and she's pretty good at getting up and down when she misses.

She also has noticed that "I do well on tougher courses… When it's too easy, I don't focus, I guess."

Her coach for the past 3½ years, Henry Brunton, said that "Stephanie has done a tremendous job improving" and is now a national-level player.

"She has excellent technique. She's very consistent and she's able to manage herself very well… She manages her emotions. She's very mature, managing herself under stress."

Brunton, an RCGA coach whose base is the Eagles Nest Golf Club, believes Klein must work on "her wedge play, putting and pitching. Her length is adequate at this point in time."

Over the summer, Klein devotes herself to golf. Between her lessons at Eagles Nest, practising and playing at her home course, the Ladies Golf Club of Toronto, she spends eight hours a day on golf.

She also plays lots of weekend tournaments. Her dad introduced her to the sport when she was 10, but she didn't play competitively until she was 13.

She loved the game right away. "I like to be out doing something different. No girls were doing it."

She enjoys the challenge the game presents and dismisses suggestions that golf can be boring.

Every course presents different challenges, she said. Even playing the same course, you never get the same lie twice. "It's always so different."

While golf is the centre of her sporting life, Klein is also an excellent student. At CHAT, she had a 95 average, winning the Eric and Marsha Slavens Award for academic and athletic achievement.

While she's looking forward to the golf at SUNY, she's not considering it a stepping stone to a career as a pro. She chose the school because of its reputation for academic excellence. She's enrolled in a pre-med program.

"I want to become a very accomplished player, but I also want an education," she said.

Tragedy mars swimmer's Olympic dreams

By ROY EITAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli swimmer Alon Mendel realized his father's dream when he qualified for the Olympic team.

Sadly, his father won't be there to see his son compete, after an accident at the family's Netanya home claimed Costa Mendel's life.

In a tragic irony, Alon, 20, was in Beijing preparing to vie for a medal when he learned his father suffered fatal head injuries after falling off a ladder outside the family home two days before the Aug. 8 opening ceremonies while trying to hang up a banner honouring his son's Olympic bid. Mendel was Alon's longtime coach.

"How do you say 'semifinals' in Chinese?" read the hand-painted banner, a testament to Mendel's optimism about the prospects of his son, who joined the Israeli delegation after another swimmer was disqualified.

For the Mendel family, the loss was made more acute by the dilemma of whether to recall Alon from the Games. He was scheduled to compete Monday in the 200-metre butterfly race.

Alon's mother, Rina, decided the best way to honour her husband's memory would be for her son to compete. Alon's sister Maya joined him in Beijing, while another sister remained in Netanya to help arrange the funeral.

"You have to stay there and be strong," Rina Mendel told her son by phone in a conversation recorded by Israel's Channel 10 television.

"You know your father waited for this moment. Your parents waited for this. We will be among 42 sets of parents watching," she said, in reference to the size of Israel's biggest-ever Olympic delegation.

Not everyone agreed with the Mendels' thinking. Reams of comments on websites disapproved of the swimmer staying in Beijing.

Channel 10 quoted him saying that when he swims, he will imagine his father sitting in the audience, cheering him on along with the rest of his family and the State of Israel.

According to Ha'aretz, Alon will fly back to Israel after competing to take part in what remains of the shivah week.

Shock, but also relief

Sadly, because I work in the news business, nothing tends to shock me, because I've likely heard a variation of all horror stories before. But the recent news of the gruesome and random beheading of a 22-year-old man on a bus has given me unshakeable nightmares.

The victim, Tim McLean, was the quintessential twentysomething: he worked at a fun summer job and was travelling the cheaper way, communicating by text message and enjoying the sounds of life through an iPod and the scenes of life through Facebook.

He was one of us.

While every aspect of this story has shocked and terrified me, the one detail that has bothered me the most has been the role played by the media. When I found out that Tim's family learned of the news when a reporter knocked at the door, my stomach turned with shame.

Tim might have been one of us, but I know that I am one of "them."

I remember my first story at a major paper. Two teens died in a boating accident, and as the newbie, I was asked to do the grim task of locating the families and speaking to them.

Luckily for me, the families of the boating victims turned out to be wonderful, and even grateful for the opportunity to speak about their children, but since then, I've knocked on the doors of many grieving families, only to have them slammed in my face.

I never blamed them.

I remember one family that I now wish would have slammed the door in my face. An elderly woman was left homeless after her grown son allegedly burned their house down after the two of them got into a dispute. The insurance company taking care of the claim refused to give her money, because her son was living in the home when it burned down.

I was pretty proud of myself when I tracked the woman down and got her to talk to me through her despair. But as the adrenaline began to wane, I wondered if my story was really worth making this nice old lady, who had already been through so much, shed a few more tears.

Sometimes, I'm so focused on making it in this profession that I forget that my job is to reflect human nature, not make a mockery of it.

As a person in her twenties, it's no wonder that Tim McLean's tragic fate has made me shudder as much as it has. This could have happened anywhere and to anyone.

But as a reporter, this story has made me question what life is all about.

There will always be a debate about how far a reporter should go to get a story, and I guess each journalist has to figure out his or her personal boundaries.

It's tough to react like a human being when your day is saturated with bad news from around the world. As I said, nothing tends to shock me anymore, and that makes me really sad.

I remember discussing this issue with a friend of mine who is a police officer. We observed that it's ironic that the professions that are supposed to reinforce a human being's belief in justice, peace and freedom do so by dehumanizing the people who work in them.

When I reacted the way I did to Tim McLean's story, I felt a wave of relief, because it meant I had a little bit of innocence left in me that allowed me to feel the shock.

All I can do now is hope that the little bit of humanity I have left will still be there the next time I have to knock on a stranger's door.

RAINBOW SLAW

- 1 small green cabbage, thinly sliced (about 8 c)
- 1 small red cabbage, thinly sliced (about 8 c)
- 2 med carrots, peeled, grated
- 1 small red-skinned sweet potato, peeled, grated
- 1 lrg unpeeled Fuji apple, cored, grated
- 1 lrg unpeeled Golden Delicious apple, cored, grated
- 1 med green pepper, cored, seeded, thinly sliced
- 3 green onions, finely chopped

DRESSING:

- 1 1/2 c mayonnaise
- 2 tblsp apple cider vinegar
- 1 tblsp sugar

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am about to embark on a real-life reality show. You might call it the "almost Brady Bunch." I am a 37-year-old divorced woman with two daughters, ages 11 and 13. Jeremy, my fiancé, is 41 with two sons and one daughter. His kids are 10, 13 and 16. Obviously, this situation is not without its problems and adjustments, but for the most part, we're all managing beautifully. We all live together, but our wedding date is fast approaching.

- The big question for now is last names. Jeremy is uncomfortable with me keeping my ex-husband's name. I have kept it because of the children. I really don't want to start changing my name to be different than my kids at this time in their lives. I don't know what the proper thing to do is in this situation. Any ideas?

Almost Brady

Dear Almost Brady

Your family now consists of five tweens and teens and two adults. If it's going as well as you say, who cares what your last name is?

Blended families today are not unusual. There are siblings in the same school, and sometimes even the same class, with different last names or hyphenated names. It doesn't change who they are.

You can't wipe the slate clean and start over. I understand that having the same last name would, in theory, create a feeling of unity, but each one of you carries a past that includes the kids. Why would you want to erase that part of your lives?

There are other ways to feel like a unified family without sharing the same last name – by sharing, understanding, love, fairness, honesty and strength.

Unity and harmony will be created as you and your fiancé stand together as one.

Once you and Jeremy are comfortable with your decision, you can discuss it with the kids and get their input. Remember: kids are growing up today in a changing world. Different last names are not unusual.

Whatever you decide, it's important that you're both comfortable with it. Your children will look to you for stability, safety and a sense of belonging. If it works for you, it will work for them.

Together you will blend your family into a strong, loving unit.

Choosing love over fear can transform your life

Love has always been an integral part of my work. My first book dealt with weddings and marriage, and my most recent book is about using anecdotes, stories and memories to tell our children how much we love them. Love really is the most powerful force.

I did a segment recently on CBC's Steven and Chris about "The seven L's of a long-lasting relationship," and a viewer wrote me to say that the segment, which focuses on being loving to your mate, loving to others and even loving to yourself, really transformed her marriage and her life.

When you are kind and loving to yourself and take yourself by the hand as you would a small child, acting in a caring, respectful and loving way, your whole being responds in a wonderful way. Similarly, in interacting with other people, even difficult ones – try proceeding from a place of love and watch the dynamic change to a more peaceful and joyous one.

So, in my quest to help people "find their bliss" as it were, I know that it helps to begin from this loving place. Sometimes you don't feel loving toward someone, and it might feel false at first. But as Anne Frank once said: "When we feel love and kindness toward others, it not only makes others feel loved and cared for, but it helps us also to develop inner happiness and peace."

With this in mind, how can we begin to foster more love and caring in all of our human interactions? How do we make love the springboard that we start from?

In Conversations with God, Neal Donald Walsch has an amazing explanation of how love can heal and purify everyone and help people to experience life in its fullest glory.

"Every action taken by human beings is based on love or fear, not simply those dealing with relationships," Walsch says. "Decisions affecting business, industry, politics, religion, the education of our young, the social agenda of your nations, the economic goals of your society, choices involving war, peace, attack, defence, aggression, submission, determinations to covet or give away, to save or to share to unite or to divide – every single free choice you ever undertake arises out of the only two possible thoughts there are: a thought of love or a thought of fear.

"Fear is the energy which contracts, closes down, draws in, runs, hides, hoards, harms. Love is the energy which expands, opens up, sends out, stays, reveals, shares, heals… Fear rankles, loves soothes. Fear attacks, love amends.

"Every human thought, word or deed is based on one emotion or the other. You have no choice about this, because there is nothing else from which to choose. But you have free choice about which of these to select."

We always have choice, and choosing to act from a place of love will always stand us in good stead.

You know the feeling you have when you first fall in love. You have a perpetual smile on your face, you feel giddy, tingly and light with excitement and joy. You are walking on air. When you look at your children, you feel that beautiful, unconditional love. Imagine how wonderful it would be if we could take that emotion and use it much more in all of our human interactions.

Walsch says that "love is the ultimate reality. It is the only. The all. The feeling of love is your experience with God In highest truth… Fear is the other end of love. It is the primal polarity."

So in essence, what you most fear is what you will continue to attract. But thoughts rooted in love will always lead you to a better place.

Brand Israel set to launch in GTA

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Israeli consulate in Toronto is gearing up for a 10-month pilot branding campaign to improve Israel's image, and its consul general, Amir Gissin, couldn't be more pleased.

"In my wildest dreams, I didn't expect how enthusiastically the Toronto community would receive my [Israel branding] initiative," Gissin told The Canadian Jewish News last week as he pored over tentative promotional material and finalized the details of next Monday's official inauguration of "Brand Israel" at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Upon his posting to Canada last year, Gissin made it clear that his mission was to "make Israel relevant" to Canadians and use Toronto as a test market for a new Israel brand during his term.

The lessons learned from Toronto will inform the worldwide launch of "Brand Israel" in the coming years, Gissin said.

Since his arrival in Canada, he's spoken on radio, TV and in print about how he wants to take the emphasis off the politics and strife in his homeland and shift it to what matters to Canadians.

To that end, Gissin has, among other projects, gamely gone fishing with TSN's Italo Labignan to promote fishing in Israel and relentlessly touted the national Israeli hockey program and the Canada Centre in Metulla. On Aug. 25, he will unveil the official Brand Israel logos and advertising that will go up across the GTA in bus shelters, on billboards, on radio and TV starting in September.

> Lessons learned will inform worldwide campaign

"The media has lots of power, but it is, at best, an agenda-setter," Gissin said. "In Israel's case, people are already talking about it. It's on the agenda. Our job is to change the focus."

Gissin said the upcoming Toronto campaign is the outgrowth of partnerships with local Jewish business leaders who are not afraid to "combine their businesses with their love for Israel."

According to Gissin, the campaign launch could not have been achieved without the help of a triumvirate of high-powered business leaders in the community, namely Sidney Greenberg, vice-president of Astral Media; Joel Reitman, president and CEO of MIJO Corporation; and David Asper, executive vice-president of Canwest Global Communications, all of whom have dedicated resources to Brand Israel.

The Brand Israel campaign was designed to connect with all Canadians and focus on Israel's innovative impact on the world. Above is one of several ads that will be displayed in the GTA starting in September.

Pleading for the gates to stay open

Some 5,000 Israelis from Ethiopia demonstrated outside the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem on Monday to protest the government's decision to end aliyah from Ethiopia. An estimated 9,000 Falash Mora – Ethiopians whose ancestors, once Jewish, purported to practise Christianity – remain in rundown camps in northern Ethiopia. More than 17,000 Falash Mora are in Israel among the 120,000 Jews in total from Ethiopia.

The News in Brief

Canada

BBYO Gets Grant

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Youth Organization's Lake Ontario region, headquartered in Toronto, received a $73,500 Ontario Trillium Foundation grant, the provincial agency said this month. To be dispensed over two years, it will fund staff, workshops and more youth-led recreation activities, as well as promote leadership and expand BBYO's alumni network. The grant was one of 485 totalling just over $3 million announced Aug. 5.

Family Drops Lawsuit

WINNIPEG — The family of an elderly Jewish man who died while at the centre of an end-of-life medical treatment dispute has dropped its lawsuit against the agency responsible for the hospital that tried to take him off life support. Samuel Golubchuk, 85, died June 24 after spending seven months on life support at Grace General Hospital. Doctors there wanted to take the Orthodox man off life support, but his family sued the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority to stop them. He died before the case could come to trial. The end of the lawsuit means the case won't set a precedent for how to deal with dying patients in similar situations, the Winnipeg Sun reported.

World

Reporter Injured

TBILISI — Yediot Achronot reporter Tzadok Yehezkeli suffered serious chest wounds Aug. 12 while covering fighting between Georgian and Russian forces in Gori, the newspaper said. Yehezkeli, 52, was taken to a hospital in Tbilisi and was in stable condition. Several journalists have been killed or wounded in the war over Georgia's breakaway South Ossetia region. Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili has accused Russian troops of deliberately firing on news reporters.

Radio Station Closes

LONDON — London's only Jewish radio station shut down after losing a libel lawsuit. George Galloway, a British MP and vocal critic of Israel, won $28,000 (US) in damages against the station, forcing its closure. He sued the station, Jcom, after an impersonator named "Georgie Galloway" used the phrase "Kill the Jews, kill the Jews" in a broadcast. The station apologized for the November show, which was heard online by 36 people and in a small area of north London.

Lawmaker Censured

TEHRAN — Iranian lawmakers condemned an official who said he was willing to be "friends" with Israelis. A statement signed Aug. 12 by 200 parliamentarians, urged Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to dismiss the vice-president for tourism, Esfandiar Rahim Mashai, calling his remarks "unforgivable." On Aug. 10, Mashai repeated his comment that Iranians are "a friend of all people in the world, even Israelis and Americans." An ally of Ahmadinejad, Mashai stressed that his country opposes Israel, not Jews.

President Pledges To Fight Anti-Semitism

CARACAS — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez promised visiting Jewish leaders he will condemn "all forms of anti-Semitism."

Chavez's pledge came in an Aug. 13 meeting in Caracas with leaders of the World Jewish Congress, arranged by the presidents of Argentina and Brazil. WJC president Ronald Lauder said Chavez promised to initiate a meeting with leaders of those nations to jointly condemn "all forms of anti-Semitism, discrimination against minorities and anti-Muslim sentiment."

Hugo Chavez

A leftist career military man, Chavez came to power in 1999 and has unsettled the West with his fierce criticism of global economic policy and his embrace of rogue leaders such as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and former Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

Chavez was accused of anti-Semitism after a 2006 speech in which he said the "the descendants of the same ones who crucified Christ" controlled the world's wealth, although some Venezuelan Jews said the critics took the comments out of context. Under Chavez, the Venezuelan Jewish community has declined by about 25 per cent, the WJC said.

"The world Jewish community is calmer now about President Chavez," Latin American Jewish Congress president Jack Terpins said after the meeting. "He has demonstrated that he is a great friend of this community."

Cemetery restricts access after explosion

'We were lucky,' president says of blast's timing, limited damage

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mount Sinai Memorial Park Cemetery should be up and running on Sunday, Aug. 24, said Neil Cohen, president of the cemetery association.

By Aug. 18, most hazardous materials on the grounds were to have been removed. As well, toppled stones were to be placed upright and damaged ones stored, he said.

Four burials were to be held this week – with only limited numbers of mourners – and this coming Sunday, 14 scheduled unveilings will go ahead as planned, Cohen said.

As bad as the damage was due to the massive Aug. 10 propane explosion next door, it could have been a lot worse, said Cohen.

"No one was there at that hour, and the one big piece of propane hit where there are no graves. I don't like to say that we were lucky, but we were," Cohen said of the early-morning blast at Sunrise Propane.

Located north of Wilson Avenue near Keele Street, the cemetery has about 11,000 graves in 21 burial sections. It sustained damage to two of them – those of the Toronto Independent Benevolent Association (TIBA) and the Kiever Synagogue. As well, chapel windows were blown out, and grass was singed.

Coincidentally, Cohen said, two gravestones were damaged – out of about 20 that were damaged in all – next to his grandparents' gravesite in the TIBA section.

"We received about 500 calls [the day after the explosion], and I understand people's shock and concern. A proper burial is one of the most important aspects of Judaism, and when something happens, you get caught off guard. Emotions are strained even at the best of times."

While the cemetery was closed to the public, funerals were held on a "restricted" basis, Cohen said.

Very 'hollow men'

From the editor's desk

Many years ago, when I was much younger, and my English literature teachers attempted to instil in my class an appreciation for poetry, as well as for the insights of some of the world's outstanding poets, we studied The Hollow Men by T.S. Eliot.

More than four decades later, I have lost even the little I understood then about that poem specifically and Eliot's poetry in general. But the severe, stark, cheerless image of the "hollow men" who "lean together" and "whisper" meaningless things to produce in the end, only nothing, has stuck with me ever since.

The image came immediately to mind last week after I read a news report of the response by the Palestinian Authority to a proposal for territorial compromise that had allegedly been made by the Olmert government.

The proposal was alleged to have been made several months ago in the wake of the much photographed and much publicized peace push by U.S. President George W. Bush at Annapolis, Md., last November.

That it was leaked to the Israeli press last week was likely due to two factors:

• The imminent departure by Ehud Olmert from the leadership of his party and the prime ministership of Israel, to show Israelis that he has tried to advance the peace process; and

• The imminent arrival by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the region, to show the American administration that the Olmert government has tried to advance the peace process. (In fact, Rice's visit to Jerusalem and Ramallah may have been postponed due to the crisis in the Caucasus. As of this writing, her trip was still scheduled.)

According to reports, Israel offered to withdraw from 93 per cent of the West Bank. In exchange for the 7%, the Palestinians were to receive land in the Negev for the West Bank settlement blocs.

Under the proposal, Israel would reportedly give the Palestinian Authority (PA) a swath of land adjacent to the Gaza Strip and a road connecting Gaza and the West Bank equal to the seven per cent of the land in the West Bank retained by Israel. The proposal is predicated upon Gaza being controlled by Mahmoud Abbas' forces and not by Hamas.

The border between the countries would be based upon the existing security fence. Ma'aleh Adumim, the Gush Etzion bloc and the communities surrounding Jerusalem and some land in the northern West Bank would remain part of Israel. Thus, most of the people who live in the West Bank communities, but not most of the communities themselves, would be within Israel.

The proposal reportedly contained detailed suggestions for the timing and the nature of evacuation of Israelis from their communities that are tied to the fulfilment of commitments by the PA.

In addition, there are reportedly detailed protocols in the proposal for security arrangements.

According to the reports, the subject of Jerusalem is pointedly not addressed.

In response to the reported proposal, Abbas' spokesperson Nabil Abu Rdainah said: "The Israeli proposal is not acceptable. The Palestinian side will only accept a Palestinian state with territorial continuity, with holy Jerusalem as its capital, without settlements and on the June 4, 1967, boundaries."

It comes as no surprise that the PA would characterize the proposal as "unacceptable." Such is the nature of interim proposals and bargaining positions of the other side, that they become "acceptable"only when they are agreed upon and enshrined into a final contract.

But for how long will PA leaders continue to mutter the mantra of the June 4, 1967, boundaries?

The constant, public repetition of the non-compromise of those boundaries merely conditions their own people to be forever frustrated and disappointed by the immutability of unrealistic expectations.

Moreover, if the PA leaders' response is to be taken at face value, it makes a mockery of the very idea of negotiations with Israel. Over what, exactly, other than the surrender of the Jewish state to every PA demand, would they be negotiating? What possible progress can such "negotiations" yield? Indeed what is the point of negotiations, other than for public relations, if they are doomed to fail?

Mahmoud Abbas

Thus, the image of the PA leaders meeting with and hectoring Israelis, posturing for the cameras, but not believing in bona fide give-and-take negotiations, evoked the memory of the image of Eliot's hollow men.

[They] are the hollow men
[They] are the stuffed men
Leaning together
Headpiece filled with straw. Alas!
[Their] dried voices, when
[They] whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless...
Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralyzed force, gesture without motion.

(With apologies to the poet for the changes in the excerpt from his poem.)

–MBD

THE KHARTOUM CONFERENCE: Egyptian President Gamal Abdul Nasser, waving to the crowd, precipitated the events that led to the Six Day War in June 1967. The war ended in disaster for the Arab world. After the war, at the end of August, eight Arab heads of state met in Khartoum, Sudan, to formulate an official response to the Jewish state's plea to negotiate peace. They answered with the famous "three noes": no peace, no recognition, no negotiations. Nasser attributed the Israeli victory to the intervention and assistance of the United States.

Community marks shloshim for soldiers' return

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The process that led to the return of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev was based on Jewish values, Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto said at last week's shloshim community memorial for the two soldiers.

Goldwasser, 31, and Regev, 25, were kidnapped by Hezbollah on July 12, 2006, in a raid on Israeli territory. Their remains were returned to Israel on July 15 in a prisoner exchange with Hezbollah.

"There was a lot of criticism about how the deal was created, but it shows that we care about each other, and that is what brought the boys home," Gissin told a capacity crowd at the Toronto Centre of the Arts' George Weston Hall. The event was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and more than 50 other Jewish community organizations, including shuls, social service agencies and schools.

Chen Shalita, an Israeli soldier who served in the Second Lebanon War, said that he didn't know the two soldiers personally, but he still waited for their return.

"The Jewish people's secret weapon is that we care for each other in a way that cannot be measured," Shalita said.

"This cannot be taken for granted. It is this [caring] that made it possible for us to bring home [these soldiers.] This is a sad day for all Jewish people, but we must remember to build and support Israel."

Maj. Gen. Elazar Stern as seen on the large screen monitor

Maj.-Gen. Elazar Stern, who worked closely with the two families in the two years that Hezbollah denied them any information about the soldiers, said that the way they conducted themselves strengthened Jews around the world.

"I was the one to tell them that their loved ones had been abducted, and from the first moment it appeared that they were noble families. They [continued] to maintain their dignity," said Stern, who is also the liaison with the family of Gilad Schalit, who has been held captive by Hamas since June 25, 2006.

In marking two years since the Second Lebanon War, he said, it must be remembered that "no matter where we come from, whether we are secular or religious, or [no matter what walk of life], there is only one Israeli army," Stern said.

"We are proud of our soldiers, and we believe that we are the army of Israel and of the Jewish people."

Stern, whose parents lived through the Holocaust and settled in Israel in 1949, said that if Israel had existed during World War II, there would not have been "that genocide. Israel is a Jewish state and a democratic state, and we must never forget that we all share the same fate."

Elyse Lackie, co-chair of Impact, UJA Federation's committee that connects Jews aged 25 to 40 to the community through philanthropic, volunteer and social opportunities, was MC for the service.

She said that all Jews grieved when the soldiers were kidnapped, "and our hearts collectively broke. We grieved with their families, with Israel, and with Jews around the world.

"Tonight we grieve together, along with Jews in Winnipeg and Calgary." (Similar services were held in those cities.)

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah recited the Prayer for the State of Israel and the prayer for the members of Israel Defence Forces.

Cantor Gershon Silins of Temple Sinai chanted prayers for the dead and Hatikvah.

No regrets over withdrawal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Elazar Stern, one of the highest ranking Orthodox officers in the Israel Defence Forces, has no regrets.

Three years after being demonized by Israel's national religious camp for supporting the unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and a handful of settlements in the West Bank, he firmly stands by his convictions.

"It's important for Israel's existence that all soldiers obey all orders," said the 52-year-old retired major-general, who was in Toronto last week.

Here at the invitation of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, he spoke at a memorial for Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, the Israeli soldiers whose remains were returned to Israel from Lebanon last month in a prisoner exchange with Hezbollah .

In an interview prior to his public appearance, Stern talked at length about the still-fresh and emotionally wrenching events that unfolded in Israel in the summer of 2005.

During Israel's withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank, some soldiers refused to carry out orders to evacuate Jewish settlers, having been egged on by rabbis and politicians affiliated with the settler movement who claimed that the Israeli government had no right to surrender holy land.

Stern, who until recently headed the army's human resources department, had no such compunctions, even though he is thoroughly observant and wears a knitted kippah, a symbol of the religious Zionist movement.

As a result of his principled position, of which he is proud, he was not only ostracized but physically attacked.

When he turned up at a settlement in Gaza on the eve of Israel's withdrawal, right-wing radicals slashed his tires and hurled insults at him within earshot of journalists covering his visit, accusing him of being a traitor.

Several months later, dozens of Jewish worshippers, led by a rabbi, yelled epithets and jostled Stern as he and his family tried to reach the Western Wall in Jerusalem to pray.

Looking back at these unpleasant incidents, Stern adopted a philosophical tone toward his detractors.

"I hope they understand I was doing my duty," he said.

But in a reference to the rabbi who attempted to block his path to the Western Wall, he was far more critical.

"I tried to convince him he was wrong, but he ignored me," said Stern, whose military career spanned 34 years. "He didn't understand the deeper meaning of democracy."

Stern was also disappointed by the reaction of the National Religious Party, one of the pillars of the settler movement in the territories, suggesting that its leaders should have condemned extremists in its ranks.

Stern declined to be drawn into a discussion regarding his views of Israel's pullout from Gaza. "I'm a soldier," he said flatly.

Organization offers scholarships to Ethiopian Israelis

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

After visiting the Ethiopian community in Israel, Jason Rubinoff and Elyse Lackie realized that something needed to be done to help the young generation.

"You could see these were people having a tough time. It wasn't about the mothers and fathers, it's about the next generation," Rubinoff said.

"They're in a standstill. Education is really the only way they can get out of this. That's when we came up with an idea for a scholarship program."

Two years ago, during a trip to Ethiopia and Israel, Rubinoff and Lackie developed Investment Program Ono (IPO).

This is a program that helps send Ethiopian Israeli students to Ono Academic College, a prestigious Israeli school in Kiryat Ono known for its business and law programs', by selling shares at $2,500 each.

IPO is an initiative of the National Ben-Gurion Society, a Young Leadership program implemented by UIA Federations Canada in cooperation with Canadian federations. The Ben-Gurion Society is made up of donors who contributed $1,000 or more to the United Jewish Appeal or Combined Jewish Appeal campaigns.

IPO has already raised enough money to send eight students to Ono. This summer, the organization has brought three of these students to intern in Toronto for one month.

According to Doron Haran, the vice-chairman for Resource Development at Ono, internships are invaluable to Israeli students.

"Israel is the land of connections," he said at a gathering last week held at Lackie's house, where donors met the Ethiopian students. "That's how this system works. [Ethiopian students] don't have connections because their parents are not playing the game. They must have an internship, but no one can find it. So we are calling. It's working in an unbelievable way."

Rubinoff and Lackie chose to work with Ono because of its enthusiasm for the program.

"A lot of schools aren't interested. [Ono] loved the idea," he said.

For Maor Sanvete, a law student at Ono who will be interning at a Toronto law firm, the college opened doors that did not exist in Ethiopia.

"I was born in a little village – we were in a separate village from modern things. I wasn't allowed to go to school in Ethiopia. I was a shepherd, it was a simple life. We left all our important things – our house, money. We took what we could and just walked away to Jerusalem," he said. "When I came to Israel, I started from nothing. I was just 12 years old, I started Grade 7. Everything for me was very hard."

While addressing the group of donors last week, Sanvete refused to accept applause. Instead, he offered his thanks.

"Thanks for Ono Academic. They support us," he said.

To Orly Sahalo, an Ethiopian Israeli who will also be interning at a law firm in Toronto, the college offers a chance to make her parents proud.

"My parents came through the Sudan in 1981. They lived in a small village… and dreamed about Jerusalem all the time," she said. "One day, they said, 'We're going to walk now' and snuck away at night. My parents walked through the desert with four little children… and lost their little girl," she said.

"Me and my two brothers were born in Israel. My parents got a simple job. They wanted us to get an education. They didn't want us to be like them. So I went to Ono Academic to study law, for my parents to be proud of me. This is for my parents and the next generation."

Ono is both a prestigious college and an expensive one. For many Ethiopian Israelis, an education at a school like this is unattainable. When he was initially approached by IPO, Haran was surprised by that.

"We realized that we were not aware that this community is stuck in gridlock. The abilities are there," he said. "Parents haven't been able to create economic stability and support. [Ethiopian students] need a push at the beginning. It's not affirmative action, it's a total win-win. They're good students."

Putin crashes Georgia, Iran takes note

Perhaps they were distracted by the ebullient fanfare of the Olympics. Perhaps they were simply stunned into disbelief by the swift, punishing brutality of the Russian attack against Georgia. Whatever the reason, it's clear that the West responded to Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin's putsch into Georgia with justified indignation, but tepid expressions of irritation, umbrage and condemnation.

To be sure, the sudden events surprised most observers. A hard-line western military response was out of the question. Showdown too often mutates into confrontation, and confrontation just as often into unintended conflagration.

It took nearly a week for the West to respond coherently.

The example of the presidents of Ukraine, Poland, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia was very compelling. They flew last week to Tbilisi, despite the raging war over their shoulders, so to speak, for a demonstration of solidarity with the people of Georgia, and with Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili in particular. Of course, their countries are most threatened by Putin in the same manner and for the same reasons as the threat to Georgia. The Russian strike at Georgia was also aimed at them.

The solidarity rally gave courage to the embattled Georgians and undoubtedly helped focus the remarks the following day by U.S. President George W. Bush.

"The United States and our allies stand with the people of Georgia and their democratically elected government," Bush said, pointedly warning Putin not to attempt the overthrow of the government of Saakashvilli. "The days of satellite states and spheres of influence are behind us," Bush added, letting Russia know that the independence of the Baltic states, for example, would not be undone.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel travelled to Tbilisi over the weekend to announce that NATO would help with reconstructing and rebuilding Georgia's military once Russia withdraws. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was scheduled to attend an emergency session of NATO this week in Brussels to help bring forth a more detailed response to Russia's actions.

Such a response must make plain to the leaders of Russia that there are consequences to its brutish, violent behaviour and that the countries of the West are prepared to exact the full measure of those consequences – multilateral, economic, diplomatic and other – from the Kremlin.

As of this writing, Russia has just begun to withdraw its troops from Georgia. It is unlikely, however, that it will let go of the coastal area it occupies and control of the pipelines there leading to the West.

The worrisome fact for the West and alas, for Israel, too, is that Iran undoubtedly took full notice of the West's initial response and is closely watching the followup.

During a visit to Canada, Moshe Many, president of Tel Aviv University, said impending government budget cuts of 20 per cent across the board would hurt higher education at a time of growing enrolment. His remarks came as Menachem Begin's Likud government was set to implement an austerity program to fight a ballooning deficit and rampant inflation.

Disregard for Olympic principles

Four years ago at the Olympics in Athens, an Iranian wrestler refused to compete with an Israeli. He came home to a hero's welcome and was given a large financial award by the Iranian government. Brian Williams, a Canadian TV commentator, called for sanctions against, Iran but nothing occurred. I and others wrote to Dick Pound, Canada's International Olympic Committee representative, but those letters went unanswered. At the current Olympics, an Iranian swimmer refused to compete against an Israeli swimmer, claiming sickness ("Iranian swimmer won't compete against Israeli," CJN Montreal, Aug. 14). Both these incidents demonstrate a flagrant disregard for the principles upon which the Olympics are said to be based. While in the scheme of things these incidents pale in importance when compared to Iran's nuclear ambitions, nonetheless, they still show how Iran can insult and even threaten Israel with impunity.

Russia's invasion of Georgia

It will be a show of moral cowardice and an undermining of our own security if the West acquiesces to Russia's criminal use of force to strangle Georgia as it embraces democracy and looks toward Europe as a model for its future progress. It will be even worse if the West concedes to Moscow's argument that Russia has the right to determine the politics of its former vassals and in doing so cravenly becomes a party to the re-division of Europe. An exhausted West did not resist the emergence of Russia's Iron Curtain when it could in 1945. We must not repeat that mistake.

The Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD) urges Ottawa to show moral leadership through concrete steps that include recalling the Canadian ambassador from Russia for urgent consultation; proposing a suspension of Russia from membership in the G-8; demanding an unconditional restoration of status quo ante in Georgia; and demanding that a team comprising G-7 members proceed immediately to Tbilisi, Georgia, to evaluate the destruction of lives and physical assets caused by the Russian invasion.

History has shown us that to delay in stopping a bully brings only greater death and destruction.

Don't stop Ethiopian aliyah

I was very surprised to read that the Israeli government wants to end the aliyah from Ethiopia ("Has the end arrived for Ethiopian aliyah?" CJN, Aug. 14). The Ethiopian aliyah is vital for Israel's survival. Former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion once said to American Jews, "Do not send only money to Israel. Send your sons and daughters also." Every Jew has the right to make aliyah from any country in the world. The sons and daughters of Ethiopian Jews serve in the Israel Defence Forces. I saw many of these fine men and women when I visited Israel. I hope that this Israeli government will not make another big mistake!

Embarrassing statement

I was taken aback by the opening passage of the column by Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon ("Highlighting a double standard," CJN, July 31): "Perhaps no other nation other than Nazi Germany has sufficiently recognized the power of propaganda. The Nazis even went so far as to elevate it to a ministry and appoint Joseph Goebbels as its minister. We Jews could take a few lessons in this art of propaganda."

I found this a rather embarrassing statement, to the say the least. Do "we Jews" want to "take lessons" from the Nazis in this or any other respect?

Women for Soviet Jewry

I am pleased that Eugenie (Genya) Intrator is remembered for her involvement with Soviet Jewry ("'Charismatic' activist fought for Refuseniks," CJN, Aug. 14).

I was president of the Federation of Jewish Women's Organizations. Our mandate was to serve all women's organizations, and every organization had a representative on our board. It was the forerunner of Toronto UJA Women's Division.

I give Intrator credit for fighting to bring Jews out of the Soviet Union, but she was not the founder of Women for Soviet Jewry, just an active and dedicated volunteer. May her memory be for a blessing.

How a Northern Ontario trapper helped the fledgling Jewish state

In celebration of Israel's 60th anniversary, The CJN has been running feature stories about Canadians who were there to help secure the birth of the nascent Jewish state during its founding. With this essay, we present a story about one of the many Canadians who helped the cause from here.

By DONALD CARR

At 11 years old, Jack Leve was sent alone by his parents to stepsisters in Montreal in order to avoid continuous pogroms – one of which had killed a younger brother – in Bialystok.

An incident outside the cheder that he attended in Montreal – involving a snowball and a rabbi, followed by a beating – took him away from family and led him to New York. There, he started his education in the fur trade by cleaning the pelts of skunks in a factory.

Years later, he returned to Canada, to volunteer for the Canadian army in World War I. He established his home again in Montreal, married, had children (one of whom would later become my wife) and, later, settled down in Sudbury, where he carried on the business of a fur trader from the 1920s until the 1970s.

That business saw him constantly spending time with native Indians, working their trap lines, staying in their homes on reservations or in wigwams during his travels of hundreds of miles in winter and summer through Canada's North.

He travelled by snowshoe and dog sled and carried a gun at all times when he was on his expeditions, each of which lasted for several months. He became a friend of the famous Grey Owl, the Englishman, who masqueraded as an Indian. His life was very much like Mordechai Richler's Solomon Gursky.

The raw furs that he bought from the Indian trappers, or were the result of his own trapping and skinning – whether beaver, wild mink, marten, fox, otter, raccoon, weasel (ermine) or muskrat – ended up in his Sudbury office or in the basement of his home.

There, they were sorted, packed into specially constructed crates and shipped to a variety of buyers. Some were sold at regularly held fur auctions in North Bay or Montreal. Others went to manufacturers in Montreal, New York and Europe, depending upon the best prices he could negotiate.

A Zionist from the time he was a young man, Leve became the president of the only synagogue in Sudbury and was a delegate from Northern Ontario to Canadian Jewish Congress for years.

In 1947, it became clear that there was going to be a Jewish state in Palestine. From time to time, strangers visited the Leve home and met with him behind closed doors in his study. He never spoke about who they were or why they came.

As the holder of a trapper's licence, Leve was able to purchase all kinds of ammunition. The family became aware over a period of time that he was buying and storing boxes of different types of bullets. He stacked them from floor to ceiling, separately, depending on their calibre, against the basement walls.

One day, Leve told his daughter, Judy, aged nine, that he wanted her to help with an important job of packing special furs. He also "recruited" his wife and mother-in-law and a few community friends to the job. There, in the basement, he showed that strange amalgam of helpers what he wanted them to do.

They were to take the skins, which had been turned inside out, and insert into the furry "inside" of the pelts a select number of rounds of different sized ammunition. The ammunition was to be positioned in a particular way. A precise number of the smaller rounds went into the narrower parts of the "body." Another precise number of the larger cartridges went into the wider part. The number of bullets so used depended on the kind of animal skin that was being packed.

He taught them how to roll the rounds by deeply massaging the leathery side of the skins, which was on the outside, until the bullets were completely hidden in the long, unsheared fur inside. Leve would then make a small cut at the tail-end of the pelt with his hunting knife. Through this slit, he would pull the tail, forming a secure closure to the ammunition-laden pelt.

Recruited team of volunteers to stuff pelts with ammunition

The pelts were then packed into the wooden shipping crates. However, because the weight of each crate had to be no heavier than normally expected, there were many fewer pelts in each crate than usual.

For weeks on end, his "recruits" found themselves in the Leve basement carrying out the mysterious pelt-packing activity. Leve's wife, Sarah, prepared sandwiches and drinks for them as they carried out their secret work.

As the crates were packed and the lids nailed down, Leve prepared them for shipment to a fur coat manufacturer in Paris and to a friend's fur business in Montreal.

Crate after crate made those journeys.

When they were inspected, only raw furs were seen through the usual open slats, which were needed on the crates to permit the furs to "breathe."

From Paris and Montreal, the crates found their way to Palestine, to a furrier in Tel Aviv named Schneidmann.

Schneidmann was a survivor of the Holocaust. He carried on a brisk trade in a salon and workshop at the corner of Bograchov and Ben Yehuda streets in Tel Aviv, designing and making furs for the wives of British Army officers and of officers in the Palestine Police. The authorities, therefore, did not question the amount of furs that he received.

However, having more furs than he could handle, Schneidmann arranged for other furriers to share in these shipments, but not before the Haganah, the underground defence forces that reported to the Jewish Agency, or the Irgun, the underground forces commanded by Menachem Begin, or Lehi, the Stern gang, in which future Israeli prime minister Yitzchak Shamir was a member, had relieved the Canadian pelts of their hidden contents. Leve did not know who received them.

The defenders of the soon-to-be-declared State of Israel welcomed this ammunition for their rifles, which had come from Czechoslovakia without bullets, as well as for other weapons, which otherwise would have been useless.

Jack Leve obtained the fourth visa issued by Israel in 1948, and he almost literally disappeared for some five months, travelling to Israel via Marseille, where he boarded the Kedma, a former refugee ship. He did not tell his family what he did in Israel during that time, and it remains unknown, except for some movies that he took, with a very unskilled hand, in various parts of the country.

Shabbat, unplugged

It used to be that when you left work, you stopped working. My father rode home on the subway, worrying about this sale and that bill, but no longer working. He left the receipts and samples back at the office. Today, my children leave the office and continue to send text messages, e-mails and receive important phone calls. Work never stops.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We live in a different world, one that's not necessarily better. After we fought for the privilege of a 40-hour work week and the right to have a weekend, capitalist modernity seems to have stripped some of us of those fundamentals. In some non-emergency professions, people need to be available 24/7.

Whatever happened to our sense of the necessity of leisure and privacy? I remember a cousin's wedding day being disrupted by the arrival of work that he had to take with him on his honeymoon.

Surely our new work ethic has destroyed many of the boundaries between the public and the private. Cellphones, laptops and other technologies, invade our homes on evenings and weekends. Plugged into our ears, they bring the office with them wherever we go.

Have you ever been to a restaurant and watched couples working instead of eating together?

When do we get to relax? When do we get to think things over? When do we get personal and family time away from all the distractions of the office?

These are important lifestyle questions that we no longer have time to ponder or respond to. And time is another factor lost in this rush to work.

It used to be you got a letter and took some time to think about your response. It wasn't expected in seconds. With e-mail, there is no time to think, much less do anything else except respond to e-mail all day long.

When do we say enough and unplug ourselves?

I worry for my children and grandchildren when it comes to this increasing abuse of our time. Many of us complain, but what can we do? It's hard to shut out the technology we rely on, and it's impossible to work without it. Some disciplined individuals can decide to work at their own pace and refuse the encroaching control of technology. But most of us are not so determined, or have jobs that demand constant contact.

I feel fortunate that I have one day a week when I can unplug without guilt.

Shabbat comes and I turn it all off.

Some see Shabbat as a day of restrictions. Others see it as a day of liberation. The public arena of work can't invade this private space of sacred personal and family time. Thank God.

Kashrut is also about ethics

Readers may know Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld, but I had not heard his name before. He is the rabbi of Ohev Shalom, the National Synagogue in Washington, D.C. A member of the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America, he heads a growing modern Orthodox shul.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Rabbi Herzfeld has written a stunning New York Times opinion piece on recent events surrounding Agriprocessors, the kosher meat-packing plant in Postville, Iowa, that was the subject of massive immigration raid on May 12.

Oy, what a mess.

Having previously heard about the company and this latest scandal, I had already confirmed that our local kosher butcher gets all his meat and poultry from Toronto – just in case – when I read the Times piece by Rabbi Herzfeld.

The rabbi described the situation: children forced to work long hours, unqualified to be wielding knives; teens working 17-hour shifts, six days a week; illegal immigrants with no recourse to the law or protection from abuse, etc.

If proved in court, these accusations make the meat being produced there suspect – not because it may be actually treif, since no one has said that – but because the ethics of its production make it unfit for observant Jews who connect kashrut with ethical behaviour, rather than with stringency in food laws alone.

My rabbi, Zev Solomon, taught the following regarding the true meaning of kashrut: In relation to the question "How can one serve God except by first serving men?" Rabbi Levi Yitzchak of Berdichev was asked by a group of his Chassidim to remind them of the most important requirements to be careful for when preparing matzah.

Rabbi Levi answered: "You have asked the wrong question. First and foremost, be careful to see that the women who are hired to fetch the water are sufficiently paid. Depending on the answer, that will make the matzah kosher or not."

Rabbi Herzfeld brought another version, attributed to Rabbi Isroel Salanter, who also responded that the treatment of workers would determine if the food is kosher or not.

Whichever version you prefer, the message is more than clear. Unethical practices count as much as the sharpness of the knife, the clarity and health of the organs, the salting, the time of soaking and washing, or the speed of the mixing (for matzah).

Kashrut is not a mechanical process that we embrace and follow because its physical observances make our table an altar. What makes kashrut so important is the ethical behaviour that should accompany it.

I gather that this plant has been certified by the Orthodox Union. According to Rabbi Herzfeld, as well as others familiar with the company, this certification has not included in its scrutiny of the company any regard for the ethical treatment of both man and beast.

When we made the decision to keep a kosher home many years ago, we were tutored in the details by wonderful families who cared not just about mechanical rigour, but most importantly about the ethics and the philosophies behind observance. Their teaching made our observance meaningful.

To say the Agriprocessors' behaviour embarrasses us as a caring and compassionate people is to understate things by a mile. It demeans us, and it holds up a distorted mirror of our religion to the world, where some are already willing to believe the worst.

But most of all, it tells us that we have not taught the right lessons. It tells me that maybe I have not been diligent enough in teaching my own children the meaning behind kashrut. I will check on that. It tells me that perhaps schools that teach the details should be looking at the ethics as well as the knives. It tells me that those who set standards of what is and is not kosher may also need to step back from minutiae and recall the ethical reasons for kashrut.

Rabbi Herzfeld calls on the OU to send a delegation to inspect and assure that the plant upholds both the laws of kashrut and of the United States, and that it treats its workers fairly.

For all of us, there is a further message.

Let's remember those pious women who fetch the water. If they're not paid a fair wage, the matzah is treif.

Religion and public policy

Previously, this column has discussed the connection between religion and politics as well as religion and the formulation of public policy. These discussions emphasized how widespread these interrelationships have been throughout history and in modern times.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Once again this became evident in response to a truly bizarre situation. Recently, an innocent passenger travelling on a bus from Edmonton to Winnipeg fell victim to a gruesome attack by another passenger. The victim, Tim McLean, was stabbed repeatedly and then beheaded. He neither knew his attacker, nor had he in any way provoked any kind of altercation.

Despite the international media attention that followed the event, his family planned a quiet, private period of bereavement. In response to this tragic event, some members of the Westboro Baptist Church, an unaffiliated American sect, illegally entered Canada and had planned to picket McLean's funeral.

This group had taken the position that the murder of McLean was justified in that it reflected the wrath of God directed at a Canadian as punishment for Canadian policies and laws relating to abortion, homosexuality and adultery. Already well-known for its protests at the funerals of American soldiers, the sect has been considered by some as little more than a hate group. Fortunately, the protest at Mr. McLean's funeral did not, in fact, occur, however, the threat was hurtful to both the McLean family and the memory of an innocent victim.

Surely, any individual can espouse personal or religious views on a given public issue. Religion has been described as a specific fundamental set of beliefs, practices and theology generally agreed upon by a number of persons. Politics has been described as the art of influence.

However, we should not turn religion into politics by attempting to influence policy-makers to subscribe to a particular set of religious values, norms and policies applicable to all. There have been many examples of religious leaders taking action to force their views on society as a whole and to attempt to influence a national agenda.

It is particularly objectionable when, in the name of religion, a group or individual uses someone's personal tragedy (such as the McLean murder) to advance a political agenda.

United States' presidential candidates publicly express their adherence to faith in order to raise campaign funds and, indeed, in order to win votes. Just recently it was reported in the National Post that in order for Barack Obama to win the upcoming presidential election, "his future rests in the hands of… evangelicals." The appeal to faith-based groups is now an accepted norm of U.S. politics. Almost every country has experienced this phenomenon. We are all aware, for example, of the influence of religious parties in the formulation of Israeli public policy.

Religion codifies or provides us with our values – moral tenets that we apply in our daily lives. It is understandable that we would want our values to be reflected in the public policies and laws established by our various levels of government. However, it is not acceptable to expect governments to adopt particular religious interpretations as a result of attacks on individuals or groups. The planned disruption of McLean's funeral is an example of insensitivity and emotional violence against innocents to further particular religious or moral precepts.

The Canadian Jewish Congress espouses certain views on public issues. But the issues, although sometimes based on aspects of Jewish theology, are universal in their appeal to individuals of all religious persuasions. Who can argue against the elimination of child poverty, the cessation of genocide in Sudan and the curtailment of hate propaganda? They are, to be sure, desirable policy objectives. These objectives represent the present policies and subjects of advocacy of Congress. We, as a community, do not argue that everyone should subscribe to particular tenets of our faith, but rather that all persons respect the basic norms of decency, civility and human rights.

Politics is politics and religion is religion and ne'er the twain shall meet. Or, at least let us be reasonable and moderate in mixing these social influences. The practice of religion and the formulation of public policy should both remain strong and healthy activities but should do so within their respected spheres.

The Kirshner File

Tom Perlmutter revitalized National Film Board

The National Film Board of Canada is unique, says its top official, Tom Perlmutter. "There is no such cultural organization anywhere else in the world," he said in a recent interview. "We're lauded and looked upon with envy. No one, not even in the United States, can match our body of work."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Perlmutter, whose five-year appointment as NFB chair and government film commissioner was announced last year by Heritage Minister Bev Oda, is the second consecutive Jewish person to hold that position. His predecessor, Jacques Bensimon, currently heads Cinémathèque québécoise.

Founded by an act of Parliament in 1939, the NFB, with headquarters in Montreal, produces and distributes documentaries, animated shorts and digital content on a diverse range of topics from a Canadian perspective and is thereby integral in promoting Canadian values. In a typical year, it is involved in some 200 projects.

Since its establishment almost 70 years ago, the NFB has made about 13,000 films and won 5,000 prizes, including 12 Academy Awards and 90 Genies.

Quite an achievement, to say the least.

Yet when Perlmutter, a filmmaker, writer and producer, joined the NFB in 2001 as its director-general of English programming, it was on the skids, having been gutted by shocking cutbacks.

"It had lost a substantial part of its budget and staff and was in a state of post-traumatic stress," said Perlmutter, who was recently in Toronto to attend the annual Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Festival and on whose board of directors he has sat since February. "It was looking for relevance," added Perlmutter, who presented nine NFB films at Hot Docs.

Perlmutter – who worked for a succession of Canadian production companies before joining the NFB – gradually pulled it out of its misery.

He revitalized the documentary and animation unit, forged ties with a host of overseas partners (Flipping Out, an NFB-Israeli co-production, is but one example), started programs for talented filmmakers in remote communities, encouraged marginalized members of the industry, such as women, and oversaw state-of-the-art technological advances.

"We were pushing boundaries and taking risks," he said, sipping a cappuccino in a downtown cafe. Now 59, he accomplished his goals with a miserly budget. "We tried to be more focused and disciplined in our choices," he explained, citing the film Up the Yangtze.

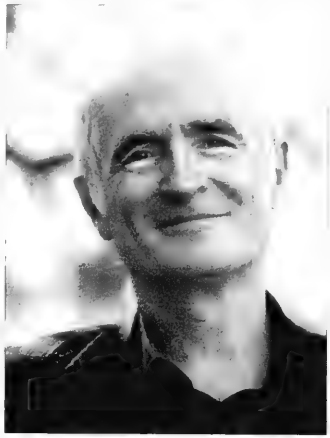
In his relatively new job, he has a lot more on his plate. As head of English programming, he concentrated solely on the creative dimension. But since June 11, 2007, he has been in charge of human resources (the NFB has 490 employees), strategic planning, finance, production, distribution and marketing.

Perlmutter, who describes the NFB as "a niche player," joined the the organization after a long and fruitful career in Canadian film.

At Primitive Entertainment, where he was a partner from 1999 to 2001, he produced The Team, an eight-part documentary on young black men in Toronto. At CineNova Productions, where he worked from 1997 to 1999, he specialized in science and history documentaries. And as founding head of documentaries at Barna-Alper Productions, he produced, among others, The Turning Points of History, The Sexual Century and The Body.

Prior to that, as executive director of Alliance for Children and Television, he specialized in children's programming. And before that, he was Toronto bureau chief of the trade magazine Cinema Canada. "I enjoyed that job very much. It gave me a grounding in the realities and players of the Canadian film and broadcasting industry."

The son of Hungarian Holocaust survivors, he was born in the town of Sarospatak, in the northeastern corner of Hungary. His father, Sigmund Danziger, a forced labourer during the Nazi occupation, died shortly after Perlmutter was born. His mother, Olga, is an Auschwitz survivor.



Tom Perlmutter

Olga and her two sons (Perlmutter's older brother, Joseph, is a realtor in California) settled in Petah Tikvah, Israel, in 1949. "She was a single mother and a factory worker, and life for her was very hard," he said.

In 1952, at the invitation of an uncle in Montreal, they arrived in Canada. Perlmutter attended Herzliah High School and earned a BA, majoring in Chinese history, at McGill University. From 1970 to 1980, he lived in Britain, studying European history at Oxford University and then working as an assistant editor and commissioning editor at a publishing house.

Returning to Canada, he accepted a job as marketing manager of a Toronto publisher before going back to school to finish an MBA degree at the University of Toronto. That degree was beneficial to Perlmutter. "It gave me a whole range of financial and business skills, which was very useful."

Perlmutter, who has two grown children, Daniel and Laura, both in the film industry, flitted in and out of jobs before finally landing at the NFB. Asked why he never stayed too long at any of his previous positions, he replied, "A restlessness, a voracious curiosity, a need to extend myself, a desire not to repeat myself."

Obviously happy with his occupational situation, he said, "I am passionate about the National Film Board. It is, I think, one of the most vital cultural institutions in the world today, a distinctive and original Canadian creation, loved at home and admired abroad. It has a unique role to play as a kind of cultural conscience and innovator for Canada, a role more urgent than ever in a rapidly shifting digital media universe."

Three emerging Israeli filmmakers

The Israeli film industry is growing and maturing and could be a force one day. Feature films such as Beaufort, which was a contender for this year's Academy Award for best foreign movie, and documentaries such as The Champagne Spy, which has won a slew of prizes, inspire hope that Israel is going in the right direction. Whatever happens, Israel's fate, in this respect, is largely in the hands of its young and up-and-coming filmmakers.

At a recent event sponsored by Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University in Toronto, I got a chance to see three new films made by students who have either graduated from or who are still studying at the university's department of film and television.

Pinchas, by Pini Tavger, brims with empathy and compassion, and is about a nine-year-old boy who's left to his own devices when his struggling Russian single mother goes to work at night or entertains her boyfriends on her days off. Feeling lonely, Pinchas, a sweet and endearing kid whose mom feeds him ham sandwiches, finds solace in religion and in the company of a warm Moroccan family. There is a happy ending. One day, his heretofore self-absorbed mother says, "Today's Shabbat. Let's take a walk." Hope springs eternal.

Roads, a gritty, heartbreaking film by Lior Geller, takes place in Lod's Arab quarter, a rundown neighbourhood infested with drug dealers, and unfolds to the beat of Arabic rap music. Ismayil, 13, is a courier for a notorious drug dealer. Daniel, a traumatized ex-soldier who served in Lebanon, buys drugs from Ismayil. Both seek an escape hatch and find one.

Dessert, a trenchant character study by Amit Sakomski about a bickering elderly couple, pits an obsessive stamp collector against a master baker. Get ready for some fireworks.

Don't just preserve your capital. Make it work for you.

'We want everyone to have a personal stake in this process'

In addition to himself, a roster of notable guest speakers will make presentations at next week's Brand Israel conference, including Larry Weinberg, executive vice-president of Israel 21c – a California-based non-profit, Internet news feed about Israel – and Barak Orenstein, a brand manager for Absolut Vodka in Toronto.

Orenstein will talk about "how to introduce a brand into Toronto" with emphasis on grassroots exposure, Gissin said.

This last point is something the consul general cannot stress enough.

"We want everyone to have a personal stake in this process," he said. "The idea behind brand initiative has been coalition-building… [and] with the conference, we want to continue recruiting people within and outside the Jewish community."

Amir Gissin

The consulate sent out invitations to select organizations and individuals in the community and expects around 200 people to attend the branding conference. Gissin hopes guests will take it upon themselves to disseminate the information they hear at the event.

"The way to fix negative images of Israel is to present Israel in a positive light elsewhere," Gissin said.

A major part of this fix will revolve around ads featuring Israeli medical developments and technology, including testimonials from patients who benefited from the Holy Land's medical innovations and the doctors who implement them will run on local radio.

Gissin said the ad blitz will be "an attack on all the senses."

The Brand Israel initiative will also pay specific attention to wooing other ethnic communities, particularly the Asian communities of Toronto.

"Asia is important to Israel. It's a major market both politically and culturally," Gissin said. "But the direct relation to [Brand Israel in Canada] is that these cultures hold their own weight in North America. I'm very interested in inter-community dialogue."

Brand Israel ads will also be strategically positioned within these communities around the city, he said.

Gissin added that the consulate is also "building bridges" with the Muslim-Somali communities in the GTA, adding that the consulate is bringing in Israeli-Ethiopian performer, Yossi Wassa, to speak to these communities exclusively next month.

"This will be our modest contribution to the Israeli-Muslim dialogue in Toronto," he said.

The consul general also alluded to other major plans for next year in his Brand Israel attack arsenal.

He revealed the Dead Sea Scrolls are scheduled for exhibition in Toronto in 2009 and that plans are in the works for a major Israeli presence at next year's Toronto International Film Festival, with numerous Israeli, Hollywood and Canadian entertainment luminaries on hand.

With the help of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, Israel will also have a "significant presence" at this year's TIFF, he said.

In the interim, Gissin plans to expose Canadians to "an exceptional number of Israeli cultural acts and scientific achievements" over the next year.

When asked if the Brand Israel initiative would be affected by a leadership change in Israel now that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has announced he will step down, Gissin said he believed that since the initiative is being run in co-operation "with local partners, I'm confident everything we plan to do will happen, regardless of the situation in Israel."

As the campaign unfolds over the next year, research to gauge the brand's efficacy with "opinion leaders" will ensue. This will be conducted every three months by Northstar Research Partners, Gissin said.

"We have a real product to sell to Canadians… but above all, we need to make Israel relevant to Canadians.

Golf tourament fundraiser planned

The Kinder Foundation's 13th annual golf tournament, at the Station Creek Golf Club in Stouffville, Ont., on Sept. 18, is a fundraiser for Bloorview Kids Rehab.

The foundation has already raised more than $1 million for the rehab centre. To date, it has funded the purchase of two specialized vans to transport the children, exercise equipment and a gymnasium in Bloorview's new complex.

Proceeds from this year's "bar mitzvah" tournament will be directed to Bloorview's Autism Services, formerly at the Hospital for Sick Children and currently being incorporated into Bloorview's Child Development program.

When Joe Arfin and Marshall Kideckel founded the foundation in 1996, their plan was to raise funds for a variety of children's charities.

"I used to run a small annual tournament for our company," Arfin says, "and decided to try to make it into a charity event." He recruited Marshall, his colleague at the International Pool and Spa Company and Jadaco Recreation Management.

"A number of friends subsequently joined us and we've become increasingly successful," Arfin says. "We raised about $15,000 with our first tournament and are now averaging over $100,000 each year.

The Kinder Foundation is also a tribute to Arfin's brother, David, who died at age 23. The brothers had been very close and had dreamed of working together in business and in helping the needy.

Bloorview is Canada's largest children's rehabilitation hospital, providing care, research and education. It serves infants, children and youth born with physical and developmental disabilities and those with rehabilitation and complex health needs resulting from accidents or illness. Bloorview's research and other programs are shared nationally and internationally. Dr. Golda Milo-Manson, Bloorview's chief of medicine and co-ordinator of medical education, recently presented a paper at a conference in Eilat, Israel.

General took flak for views on Gaza pullout

Orthodox officer backed 2005 move

However, he observed that the police rather than the army should have supervised the withdrawal. "The police should carry out such missions. The army should avoid them."

Stern, a former commander of the army's paratroopers training school and officers training school, urged caution in assessing the problem posed by religious soldiers who refused to obey orders during the pullout.

Noting that only 10 to 20 soldiers disobeyed orders, he said that the vast majority of soldiers aligned with the national religious camp did their duty, and that most are loyal to the state and wish to serve society.

"They want to be the best soldiers they can be," said Stern, a father of five children whose own son is an officer.

Yet when he was asked what the response of the national religious camp might be should Israel agree to withdraw from much of the West Bank as part of an agreement with the Palestinians, Stern said, "I don't know."

A thorn in the side of the religious Zionist camp, Stern has also been criticized for his view on the hesder yeshivot program.

Established after the Six Day War, it combines Torah study with shortened military service. In many cases, its graduates have been assigned to segregated, religiously homogeneous units.

"It's a good system, but it would be a better one if religious and secular soldiers were placed in the same units" said Stern. "Let religious soldiers get to know secular soldiers, and let secular soldiers get to know religious soldiers. Let's bring them together."

As well, Stern believes that the number of students in the program has grown too large and that rabbinical authorities should be more discriminating in choosing candidates.

On a related topic, he said that too many able-bodied haredim wriggle out of military service altogether.

The son of Holocaust survivors who settled in Israel in 1949, Stern is one of only a few staunchly observant soldiers who rose in the ranks to general.

When he was conscripted in 1974, there may have been one or two such generals in the army. Today, there are about 10. In another sign of the times, a greater number of religiously observant officers command platoons, he pointed out. In general, the percentage of religious officers is considerably higher today than it was before the Six Day War, Stern added.

"It's easier being religious in the army today," he said. "You can observe Shabbat, and you are not alone. Kosher meals are universally available. You don't feel hatred. Yeah, it's easier, more convenient."

Asked why this is the case, Stern said, "Demography."

There are simply more religious Jews in Israel today and their needs must be accommodated, he explained.

In closing, Stern said his biggest contribution to the army was introducing extensive Zionist and Jewish identity courses and sending officers to Poland to heighten their knowledge and awareness of the Holocaust.

UIAFC reaffirms commitment to Sderot

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The people of Sderot will always have an ally in Canada's Jewish community, UIA Federations Canada says.

Linda Kislowicz, UIAFC's CEO, said in statement earlier this month that her organization, which raises money for Jewish initiatives in Canada and abroad, will "always be there to help fortify and strengthen a secure future for [Sderot's] brave and highly motivated residents."

UIAFC said it's upholding an "ongoing promise" to the embattled Israeli town, and to other periphery communities in Israel, to always come to the aid of its citizens.

"Just as Qassam rockets [from Gaza] continue to fall – even after the declaration of a ceasefire – so, too, will Canadian support always be there for Israel and the people of Sderot," Kislowicz said.

UIAFC has dedicated $3.5 million over a three-year period – starting last year via the Israel Emergency Campaign – for the people of Sderot. It said it has also received another $3 million in funds from partner agencies, including its Israeli office (UIAC), Keren Hayesod, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

UIAFC has allocated more than $125,000 for summer programs in Sderot in 2008. These include funding for summer camps, transportation and money for the "Youth City of Sderot" program, a project administered by Israel's Ministry of Public Security's Community and Crime Prevention Department, which organizes a week of games, entertainment and food for thousands of Sderot youth. The program is now in its second year.

Yossi Tanuri, director general of UIAC, told The CJN via e-mail that to date, nearly $2.5 million of the funds have been spent, with $1.5 million funding a "short-term need for summer camps outside of missile range" for Sderot youth, and for "trauma relief programs" at home, in schools and at walk-in clinics.

Another $1 million was allocated for the construction of a "fortified second floor" to make Sderot's main community centre Qassam-proof this year.

"Our two initial goals have already been achieved: creating sustainability of programs by offering a three year commitment and anchoring young communities in Sderot by funding their programs for youth [and] creating a comprehensive coalition of service providers for youth," Tanuri said.

He added: "While we are already observing and benefitting from the initial fruits of UIAFC investment in Sderot, [our] Israel office... together with our local partners in Sderot, envision a deepening of dialogue between local organizations that will lead to new joint ventures in the future."

Funerals continue on 'restricted' basis

"The fire department [monitored] the safety of the air quality and the debris littering the grounds, and gave us permission to allow the lead car, the hearse, and one or two family cars per funeral. Guests attending services at the funeral parlors will be advised," he added.

"As well, there [were] no visitations and no unveilings."

The important thing, he said, is that the bodies were treated with dignity and buried within the proper amount of time.

Cemetery manager Phil Grenfell said that "by the grace of God, it happened when it happened. It would have been a terrible tragedy if it happened [in the afternoon that Sunday]."

He said that all repairs will be covered by insurance and would begin when all the metal from the explosion is removed and the police wrap up their investigation.

Families were to be notified about damaged gravestones once the cemetery assessed the damage, Grenfell said.

As of The CJN's deadline, the annual memorial parade by the Wingate Branch #256 of the Royal Canadian Legion – scheduled for this Sunday – had been cancelled, a branch spokesperson said.

Human rights complaint dismissal spurs more debate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Earlier this month, the director of the Alberta Human Rights and Citizenship Commission dismissed a complaint against the Western Standard magazine for re-publishing cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad that had already been printed in Europe, yet the magazine's former publisher is far from feeling vindicated.

It took the commission 900 days before it rejected the case, and in that span, he ran up $100,000 in legal bills, while the province's bill is $500,000, Ezra Levant said.

Levant is particularly perturbed that in the end, it was a decision by a commission bureaucrat that determined the magazine did not run afoul of human rights legislation when it published the controversial cartoons in 2006.

"I should have the right to publish even if a second-rate bureaucrat does not approve it," he told The CJN in a telephone interview from Alberta.

The power of the commission to investigate complaints and potentially restrict freedom of speech "is a huge problem not just for me, but for every journalist in the country, " he said.

The complaint against the Western Standard and Levant was brought in May 2006 by the Edmonton Council of Muslim Communities, prompting an investigation by the commission's southern regional director. In dismissing the complaint, the commission stated that, "given the full context of the republication of the cartoons, the very strong language defining hatred and contempt in the case law as well as consideration of the importance of freedom of speech and the 'admonition to balance,' the southern director concludes that there is no reasonable basis in the information for this complaint to proceed to a panel hearing."

The cartoons in question were first published in Denmark and sparked rioting and deaths in the Muslim world. The Western Standard, along with the Jewish Free Press, a small newspaper in Alberta, were the only Canadian publications to reproduce the cartoons. (The complaint against the Free Press was dropped after it agreed to print a rebuttal.)

The Western Standard/Levant case highlights an ongoing controversy that has ebbed and flowed in Canada for years, if not decades. On the one side are those advocating a liberal interpretation of freedom of speech, in which the media should not be subject to administrative review by the likes of human rights commissions. Proponents of that view include Alan Borovoy, general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, who was one of the earliest advocates of human rights legislation. He has said that the laws were intended to combat discrimination in lodging and services, not to police expression.

On the other side are those who argue there is no unlimited right to free speech in Canada and that federal human rights commissions and similar provincial bodies should regulate hate speech to protect vulnerable minorities. Mainstream Jewish organizations share that view.

Levant suggested that the only reason the commission dropped the case was because of the bad publicity it had spawned. "I could afford lawyers and take it to the Supreme Court and beat up on the Human Rights Commission. That's why I was let go. They were worried about the daily PR beating they were taking."

Had the case gone forward, Levant said he would have argued that it's "unconstitutional for a government bureaucrat to look through my magazine and say what I can or cannot publish."

Ezra Levant

He criticized what he called "official Jews" – Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center – for supporting human rights commissions, which he said had focused primarily on anti-Semitic cases in the past.

"Jews are not about censorship," he said. "It's very un-Jewish to censor your opponent. It's Jewish to debate your opponent."

Levant applauded B'nai Brith Canada for its recent announcement calling for urgent reforms of the human rights system in Canada. It was a good "first step," he said.

In a news release, B'nai Brith said it was "long concerned with the defense and improvement of Canada's human rights system [and] is calling for urgent reform of human rights commissions."

David Matas, B'nai Brith's senior legal counsel, said the recent case involving Levant, as well as one against author Mark Steyn and Maclean's magazine, were catalysts that prompted the organization to re-examine the commissions.

Maclean's and Steyn are facing a human rights hearing in British Columbia over excerpts of Steyn's book, America Alone, which the magazine published. The complaint was launched by Mohamed Elmasry and Naiyer Habib of the Canadian Islamic Congress. The book argues that radical Islam poses a threat to western societies.

"I think the fact that the cases came forward show that there are complainants prepared to use the institutions for a political purpose," Matas said.

B'nai Brith has met with Richard Moon, a law professor who is reviewing the Canadian Human Rights Commission's mandate on hate literature. The organization has recommended changes to the commission's procedures to rule out politicized complaints, Matas said.

Those would include limiting complaints to a single jurisdiction, awarding costs against those who attempt to abuse the system by harassing "bona fide respondents" and educating investigators on the "get-political context within which they operate."

Matas said unlike Levant, B'nai Brith doesn't want to see the commissions refrain from adjudicating speech cases. "The right to be free from incitement is worth protecting," he said. "The incitement to hatred can have an impact on people that can lead to violence."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said Congress first expressed "serious concerns on the need to reform" the federal human rights legislation last October.

Congress believes the process can be improved by speeding it up, as well as by putting in place a mechanism to ensure frivolous cases are dismissed quickly, awarding costs to the winner, and perhaps appointing an ombudsman or "someone well versed in human rights law" to approve complaints.

"The Steyn and Levant cases should never have come before commissions," Farber said, but he added that this doesn't mean the entire process should be eliminated.

The Supreme Court of Canada has upheld the constitutionality of the human rights legislation, and even though some see it as an infringement on the Charter right to free speech, "the anti-hate laws have been used as a shield and they provide a sense of protection to minority groups," he said

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, agreed the federal human rights legislation could be improved, but he argued Canadians have chosen to adopt a European model of restricted free speech and not the more open American model.

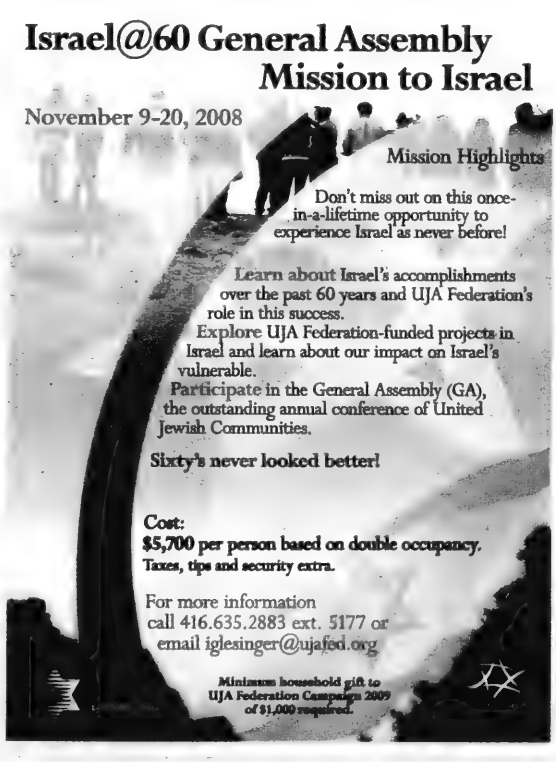
Asked to comment on Levant's argument that the process in itself is the punishment given the costs needed to defend against a complaint, Adler replied, "We live our entire lives under ABCs – agencies, boards and commissions – that govern different aspect of our lives." Lawsuits, police investigations and other legal matters might require an individual to incur costs by hiring a lawyer, he said.

He said that every genocide, including the Holocaust, started with words. "We don't want words that have the potential for causing these catastrophes."

Levant, however, dismissed that line of argument. Hitler, he said, gathered strength in the Weimar Republic, which had legislation against hate speech.

"What killed Jews in the Holocaust was not hate speech." As well, he noted, the Shoah was preceded by the Nuremberg Laws and the removal of Jewish rights to property, self defence and even life itself.

"We're foolish if we think that controlling speech will protect us from real violence," he said.



Mom sees son as 'casualty' of She'arim closing

By FRANCES KRAFT

Andrea W. is taking her son who has learning disabilities out of the Jewish day school system and putting the nine-year-old in a private school that caters to students like him.

"I guess we're one of the first casualties," she told The CJN, referring to the decision earlier this year to close the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School 27 years after its opening.

Debbie Gladstone, executive administrator, Mercaz

She'arim, which last year had 75 students, served children from grades 1 through 8 with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, and mild forms of autism.

Andrea, who asked that her real name not appear in print, said it recently became apparent that her son "needs a proper program" above and beyond the extra help he was already getting at his school.

Because he was not already a student at She'arim, he was not eligible for the new program being set up to serve the needs of former She'arim students at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Similar programs, each of which constitutes, in effect, a school within a school, will also be running at Netivot Hatorah Day School (for middle school students) and at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (for Grade 8 students).

Of She'arim's 50 students who were not graduating, 15 have enrolled in TanenbaumCHAT's Grade 8 program (along with three students who were not at She'arim). Fourteen will be at Associated, and seven at Netivot.

"We have placed over 70 per cent of She'arim children who need to be placed at host schools, and we're very happy with that," said UJA Federation of Greater Toronto spokesperson Howard English.

Or Haemet Sephardic School is taking at least one former She'arim student, English said. So is Eitz Chaim Day School.

"They wouldn't let them in unless they could accommodate them," English said.

The schools hosting the post-She'arim programs will provide art and music therapy, as She'arim did, English said.

The three programs are being developed this summer, said Debbie Gladstone of the federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (formerly its Board of Jewish Education, now known informally as the Mercaz).

Gladstone, who was the director of the now-defunct Tikun Chaim – the Mercaz's special education division, which closed a year ago and whose services have been redistributed within the organization – now has the title of executive administrator and is involved in various projects.

As far as the other Jewish day schools are concerned, they "are able to provide support on a much larger spectrum than they could before," said Gladstone, who noted that some students still need help above and beyond that.

"There's a lot happening in the schools today that didn't exist even five years ago."

For students who are entering the three post-She'arim programs, the segregated nature of the programs will give the staff time to work with them, get to know them and see what areas they can be mainstreamed in, as well as to develop individual education plans, she added.

Tuition will be the same as it was at She'arim, because "the services will be comparable, and the support will be comparable," English said. The actual cost, which is being partially subsidized by federation, is "considerably more than tuition," he said.

The new programs are in place for the coming year, and "the objective is for them to be able to continue," he added.

"I don't know that She'arim would have been the right place [for my son]," mused Andrea, who said she regrets having to pull out of the Jewish school system. "[But] when you're in the Jewish day school system and they already talk about not losing anybody, it's pretty sad that we're gone."

She is also not sure how to continue her son's Jewish education now. "He doesn't fit in to the regular [supplementary school] program," because he has a more intensive Jewish background, she said.

Earlier this summer, Andrea was looking more seriously at Jewish overnight camps. "Maybe we would have waited one more year, but it's really important to us that he's involved."

The added financial burden of camp, coupled with the loss of a subsidy that will not be matched at a private school, is also a concern, Andrea said.

Parents face difficult choices

Andrea W. and her son are not the only ones who have faced difficult choices as a result of She'arim's closing.

According to Sidney Braun, co-president of She'arim – which still exists as a corporation and a charity – a group of parents have been looking into sending their children to Eitz Chaim because it is more reflective of their lifestyle.

Kathy Manoim, former She'arim principal, said there are some Orthodox parents who wanted a "more religious environment" than what's offered by TanenbaumCHAT or Associated – two out of the three schools, along with Netivot HaTorah, that will host special programs for She'arim students this fall. Also, Manoim added, some parents wanted a less religious environment.

Kathy Manoim, former She'arim principal

At She'arim, she said, children were "united by the fact they all had learning issues." There were no expectations regarding home observance levels, although there was always "a [high] level of observance" at school, she added. Manoim will continue working with former She'arim students as supervisor of the social work program in the three schools.

Avraham Birenbaum, 10, will be returning to Eitz Chaim after a year at She'arim, in part because the school's religious outlook is compatible with the family's, said his mother Suzanne. She noted, however, that being with children of differing observance levels at She'arim "added a whole new positive dimension to Avraham's life."

Her son – who has ADHD and fine motor issues that affect his handwriting, but who is also academically gifted – doesn't want to go through another move to a new school, and prefers to be with his friends at Eitz Chaim, she said. Suzanne noted that he has been studying Gemara with a tutor, which was not part of the She'arim curriculum.

Avraham has been accepted as a regular student at Eitz Chaim, Suzanne said.

Jana Kofler's 12-year-old son, who is eligible for the program at Netivot, will be attending public school next year in Thornhill. The school offers "full integration, with dedicated support," she said.

"We were looking for more integration," added Kofler, who didn't favour the "school-within-a-school model."

"We decided the best value was to invest [money previously allocated to day school tuition] into private tutoring for Jewish subjects, and math and English."

"There just isn't a perfect solution," Braun said. Parents who have opted for other Jewish day schools will not get the same benefits as the three designated schools, he noted.

Manoim noted that even during She'arim's last few weeks of operation, she received calls from three or four people who were interested in enrolling their children and hadn't heard that the school was closing.

English said that the Mercaz has been "in constant communication" with She'arim parents.

Susan Yalowsky and her husband, Stuart, have two daughters who were She'arim students. Emily, 13, who just graduated from She'arim, is continuing on to the program at TanenbaumCHAT.

Sydney, 11, would have been accommodated at Netivot under the new plan, Yalowsky said, although the school, which is modern Orthodox, separates boys and girls in higher grades, and Sydney would have been the only girl moving to Netivot from She'arim.

Rebecca Moses, the only other girl in Sydney's grade at She'arim who might have gone to Netivot, will attend public school next year, also in Thornhill.

Initially, Rebecca's mother, Ann, wasn't as positive about the public school option, but she changed her mind after meeting with staff there.

Moses added that she was planning to try private tutoring to keep up her daughter's Hebrew. "It's a pity I had to take her out of the system, but we have to do what's best for them."

"It's been very difficult," said Susan Yalowsky, who along with her husband weighed several options, including public school, before settling on the Toronto Heschel School.

"At this point I'm just happy to have the situation settled… I'm happy she'll be in the Jewish system," she said, adding that she hopes more support will be forthcoming from the federation.

"Every school has children with learning disabilities."

Yalowsky had only positive comments about Netivot, which she said would have accommodated her daughter. Among her reasons for choosing another day school was that Netivot is "not our lifestyle," she said.

"There's no situation that's perfect," Yalowsky said. She believes, however, that closing She'arim was "a disaster" for the students.

But Joy Koplowitz, a senior psycho-educational consultant for JVS who also works at TanenbaumCHAT and Associated, said she's "positive" about the plan that's in place for students who were at She'arim.

She said the students she has worked with "have a lot of strengths to bring to the learning table." She believes the biggest challenge for the schools they will be attending in the fall will be to help socially integrate them. "I think that's the challenge they face – to create an environment where everybody's differences are appreciated and accepted."

"I just hope that these schools are going to find programs to socially integrate them, whether through Shabbatons or through some subjects, [such as] gym."

Social issues are a particular challenge in middle school, she noted. Speaking in a general sense, she noted that "social differences are hard to manage" at that stage.

"It's less likely a teacher's going to intervene at the middle school level. Often, they don't hear what's going on in the hallways… I think that emotionally kids at that age are also very sensitive."

She credited She'arim for building students' confidence and self-esteem, but said she didn't think the school was as strong in social integration, because "for the most part, the students have been segregated."

New teacher workshops planned for fall

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Lola Stein Institute is branching out this fall with a new initiative: a series of nine independent dinner workshops for teachers called "Food for Thought."

The Toronto-based institute, which focuses on teacher training and curriculum development, was founded in 2003 within the Toronto Heschel School.

Earlier this year, the institute brought Columbia University's New Teacher Academy program to Heschel to increase teacher retention and encourage leadership in the classroom.

In March, it began publishing a quarterly newsletter called "Leadership in Education." An e-newsletter was set to launch Aug. 15.

The institute's first Food for Thought workshop will be held in September. The workshops will incorporate philosophies of "integrative" – meaning cross-disciplinary – and "integrated" education – blending Jewish and general themes – and will run monthly until May 2009.

Four of the sessions are for elementary and junior high educators from all school systems. The rest are designed for teachers in Jewish schools.

The workshops will be held at the Wagman Centre. Among the topics are Metaphor and God, the Five Senses and the Five Books of Moses, Write to Think, Democratic Citizenship from a Jewish Perspective, teaching Jewish Texts Through the Arts, and Ancient History and Me.

Each workshop is hands-on and provides training on creative methodologies for teaching a particular topic, according to a news release.

Co-founder and institute chair Pam Stein said that the institute "has separated from the Toronto Heschel School so that children, at schools of any denomination, public or private, worldwide, can benefit from the accumulation of best practices in integrative study, thinking skills and learning through the arts."

The institute is named in memory of Stein's mother-in-law.

She noted that there are non-Heschel people involved in the institute, which is headed by director Gail Baker, who co-founded the institute with Stein and is also head of school at Heschel. Greg Beiles, Heschel's head of curriculum, serves as the institute's director of curriculum and training.

"We piloted the institute's original integrative approach and distinctive program for the past decade at a Toronto Jewish day school," Baker said in the news release. "For that setting, we developed and implemented a unique integrated studies curriculum, using the integrative and arts-based methods, so the students would see the world through two overlaid lenses all day long – a universal lens and a Jewish lens."

Stein, a mother of one Heschel student and three Heschel graduates, noted that, more typically, North American Jewish day schools have split the day, with half the time devoted to Jewish studies and the other half to general studies.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

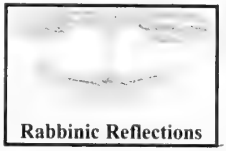
God watches over the Land of Israel

By RABBI YOSSI MICHALOWICZ



The Torah tells us that the land of Israel is not like any other land.

Unlike Egypt, which has a constant supply of irrigation from the Nile River, the Holy Land drinks water by the rain of the heavens. Indeed, this lack of readily available water has always been a major issue for Jews living in Israel.

Recent concerns that the Kinneret has receded below its "black line" bear out this point. The fact that water is so sparse in Israel is probably why the tiny Kinneret, which is smaller than many hundreds of lakes in Ontario, is referred to as a yam – a sea . That term is relative to the size of the rest of the country.

Yet, the Torah also tells us that the Land of Israel is a good land. One must wonder what's so good about a land that lacks the most basic natural resource of all – water. Water is such a vital need. Without it, people die.

I believe this seeming contradiction can be best understood using the following analogy. As young children growing up, we need our parents to support us. Some children get an allowance, while others don't. But who benefits more – the child who can count on a set, weekly supply of cash, or the one who must approach his or her parents with each need?

I believe the latter child benefits more. The child with the allowance may have an automatic income, but this limits contact with his or her parents.

The child with no allowance must come to the parents more often. This benefits both parties through added interaction. Discussing the child's needs and daily activities ensures that the parents become more involved in the child's life. Turning to one's parents, and feeling their love through their desire to continuously give, can only strengthen the parent-child bond. Even when being turned down, the child is being taught that perhaps not all things that we ask for are good for us.

Not only does the child bond more with the parents, he will probably end up receiving more than the child who has a mutually agreed-upon, steady allowance. It's harder to say no to a child who totally relies on you.

I was one of those children who never received an allowance, and often I would hesitate to ask for too many things, but I gained so much from the feeling that I could call on my parents at any time knowing that they would always give me what I needed, if I deserved it.

Likewise, many countries are blessed with an abundance of natural resources, so much so that they may never need to ask God for anything and will, therefore, not bond with the loving Creator. But the lack of water in Israel forces us to turn to God on a regular basis and ask Him to give us water from the heavens as we need it, constantly reaffirming the biblical statement that Israel is a land where the eyes of God are always upon it.

Indeed, the land of Israel is a good land – a land that forces us to constantly appreciate the gifts that God showers upon us. Only in Israel can you find people genuinely happy when it rains and pours. They never complain about their plans being ruined. Rather, they enjoy feeling the loving embrace from their Father in heaven.

Going back, 30 years later

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

This past June, I attended my 30-year college reunion. (OK, now you can figure out my age. I don't get why women are so uptight about that, but that's for another column some day.)

It was powerful and bittersweet at the same time.

It was bittersweet because you simply can't go home again. Going to your college reunion drives home the point that you aren't young and carefree any more. It reminds you that you aren't, for the most part, in a highly stimulating intellectual and academic atmosphere every day – sitting in classes, learning fascinating new things, making new friends, going to lots of parties, and hearing amazing speakers (all in one day!). It's a reality check. You return home from the reunion to your work, bills, kids, aging parents, relationship challenges, house repairs and the daily mundane trivia that fills your life.

But it was powerful because reunions lead you to look at your life and see how much you've accomplished, how far you've come, and how (or if) you've grown. It forces you to look at your life reflectively.

Generally, only "successful" classmates come to reunions – the ones who are still married, still working and still healthy – and that's OK.

But they're also still happy, for the most part – maybe even happier than they were 30 years ago, and that's the powerful part.

Why? Because not only have we changed, but the world has changed. Because my female classmates don't have to fight so much anymore for rights and recognition. Because my gay classmates have been able to come out, find partners, have kids and live open lives. And because some marriages and friendships actually lasted, like the one between my college roommate and I who are still very close friends (and roomed together at the reunion), and like the couples that you knew were "going to make it" and actually did. (Some really bad relationships also ended – the ones you doubted even back then proved you right.)

The weekend was profound, too, because superficial conversation soon gave way to real sharing. After all the "How are you?" and "You look great" comments, the weekend would quickly have become boring if we didn't talk about real things. So we did, and I found that people who were interesting 30 years ago still were, and they had deep insights that still touched me the way they did back then.

I must say that I went with trepidation, but I am so glad I did go. You bring the sweetness of who you were to who you are now, then relive the moment for just a moment and move on.

I also met my Canadian classmates, whom I'm sure I ignored for four solid years, thinking – in my American ignorance – that they must have lived in igloos and come to college by dog sled.

Everyone I saw remembered that I had wanted to become a rabbi back then, and that reminded me of the passion I had. I even made some new friends, heard some great speakers, went to a party, sat in a class and, for a brief weekend, felt just a little young and carefree again.

Talmudic zoning laws stress safety

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

I was woken on the night of Tisha b'Av by a massive explosion, and the sight of a huge fireball in the sky over Toronto and the continuing sounds of explosions were quite disconcerting, to say the least. The proximity of our home to the blaze added an element of fear and uncertainty – appropriate feelings for Tisha b'Av. It made me think about how much worse it was for those who have actually had to endure bombings in their cities.

In the aftermath of the event – thankfully, considering what could have happened, the term "disaster" is an overstatement in this context – the question of the appropriateness of storing gas tanks in residential areas has been raised.

One of the key issues in city planning is balancing the commercial needs of a town's residents with the desire for people to live in a quiet residential area. Jewish law prohibits the opening of a commercial enterprise in a residential neighborhood, accepting the claims of the nearby residents that they "can't rest from the noise of those who come and go."

Commercial activities should take place adjacent to residential areas, which in modern times might translate into separate streets. Nonetheless, you are allowed to make vessels in your own home to take to the marketplace to sell. In this instance, the claims of the neighbours that the noise disturbs them is rejected, since such activity is deemed normal and natural, provided it doesn't involve excessive noise, with such definitions presumably determined by each locale.

In addition to noise pollution, our rabbis were quite sensitive to the impact of sight and smell on the quality of life. Thus, slaughterhouses, cemeteries, tanneries and the like had to be set up outside city limits, far enough from the impact of prevailing winds. Similar injunctions forbade activity in my own yard that might negatively affect my neighbour, such as having my tree overhang a neighbour's property.

A much more serious set of zoning laws was instituted to safeguard against the enormous potential damages and danger caused by fire. In instances where the fire spreading could have or should have been foreseen, a perpetrator would be liable for damages caused despite any inadvertent result. An example might be a fire caused by carelessly burning chametz before Pesach. In these instances of liability, our sages debated whether a person is liable for hidden damages, such as money that is hidden in a tree that accidentally burned down.

However, we are not responsible for events beyond our control. These might include lightning strikes, earthquakes and excessive winds spreading fire from one property to the next. The talmudic discussion focuses on the levels of expected safeguards, beyond which we are not responsible. Recognizing that it's next to impossible to give exact criteria, the accepted ruling is that each case must be judged individually – it's more difficult, but it's a fairer system, one that requires forethought and analysis.

Certain activities carry inherent risk, so that despite precautions being taken, we're still responsible for ensuing damages. In talmudic times, members of a courtyard would share an oven that would be kept outside the home. If you wanted to have an oven in your home, you had to ensure a distance of at least four cubits between the oven and the ceiling. Nonetheless even if the necessary safeguards were taken you are still liable for damages caused. Such a principle might obligate you for unexpected damages caused by barbecuing.

To remove all potential dangers from a neighbourhood is impossible. The role of zoning laws is to ensure that appropriative safeguards are taken for expected contingencies. It's not our responsibility to protect against acts of God, nor are we capable of this.

Hebrew through sight and sound

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at websites that help teach Hebrew. Today, we continue to look at Hebrew on the web and focus on lessons that you can listen and watch, too. Some of these lessons are quite conventional, others come out of left field. All will help you learn the language.

Tiqva BarOn, a Hebrew lecturer at Rice University, has created a great site that improves both oral comprehension and reading skills. Her Hebrew e-Book for Beginners has 33 recorded dialogues, in increasing levels of difficulty. Each one has its entire text transcribed so you can listen and follow along. And about half of them have corresponding exercise sheets that you can download, too. [lang.rice.edu/baron]

Hebrew at Stanford: Multimedia is another gold mine. There are links to dozens of clips with such scenes as Hebrew video tours of an apartment, buying a newspaper and ordering food and drink. While on the site, don't miss the link to the excellent online drills. The one on colours lists Hebrew words and challenges you to find corresponding answers from a pull-down palate. This is a wonderful site for intermediate-level students. [tinyurl.com/stanfordheb]

From Stanford we travel south to Texas for more clips that re-enact everyday situations. If you are really keen, you can even purchase the textbook mentioned at the site. The book complements the clips and tutorials on the website. [tinyurl.com/texasheb]

If all that sounds a bit too advanced, then you can go for simple at the Travlang site and you'll hear native Hebrew speakers tell you everything from "Ani ro'tse liknot" ("I'd like to buy…") to "Eifo hasherutim?" ("Where's the bathroom?") [tinyurl.com/travlang] And if you're interested in comparative languages, the same words are available in about 100 other languages, including Esperanto, Chipewyan, Hawaiian and Xhosa. [travlang.com/languages] (This site is worth visiting, but make sure your browser's pop-up blocker is on or you will be inundated by numerous, annoying ads.)

If you're the type who prefers to soak in your Hebrew passively, then just leave the radio on all day. It's easy to do with any of the dozens of Israeli radio stations that stream programming live over the Internet. Lawrence Grossman's JewishWebcasting is the best catalog of Israeli and Jewish media on the web, with links to Hebrew-language radio stations, including Galei Tzahal and Kol Yisrael. [tinyurl.com/hebradio]

I want to give a plug to some software that has greatly simplified listening to Israeli radio for me. "Israel Radio" is a toolbar that becomes part of your browser when you download it. Once the software is installed, you'll see preset buttons for about 20 Israeli radio stations. Click on one of them and a station will start playing almost immediately. I can't guarantee how this software will operate on your computer, but I've never had a problem with it. [israelradio.lihi.co.il] (Unfortunately, it only has limited functionality on Macs.)

One of the hottest hip-hop groups in Israel is Hadag Nachash (whose music is featured in Adam Sandler's You Don't Mess with the Zohan.) Their most famous song is Shirat Hasticker (The Sticker Song), which was written by Israeli novelist David Grossman. The song's lyrics are a very clever listing of popular and often contradictory Israeli bumper stickers – most authentic, some slightly altered.

More than a novelty, this is a fascinating and provocative song that gives you a glimpse of the passions roiling throughout the country. You can listen to the song [tinyurl.com/stickermusic] and download the lyrics and a generous package [tinyurl.com/stickersong] that explains the significance of the various slogans. Quite an education.

Hebrew may be the language of the Book, but could it be the language of the stars, too? Now that you have mastered the language (and even if you haven't), take a listen to how it's spoken by a couple of well-known names. Start with Natalie Portman, the Israeli-born actress who speaks of her ties to the country of her birth. [tinyurl.com/nportman] And then listen as Borat (Sacha Baron Cohen) speaks with an Israeli journalist about his life and career. Borat is adamant that he's speaking Kazakh. But to me it sounds much closer to the language revitalized by Eliezer Ben-Yehuda. [tinyurl.com/boratheb]

אזעלכע און ענלעכע טענות האָבן זיך ווּאָס אמאל מער געלאָזט הערן. דערווייל האָט זיך די יידישע ליטעראטור ווּאָס אמאל מער אנטוויקלט.

און איצט לאָזן מיר וייטער פירן, ווּאָס זיי האָבן אנגעהויבן. איך עפן די ערשטע קאָנפערענץ פאַר דער יידישער שפּראַך.

מיר ווילן נאָך אַמאָל דאַנקען פּראָפ. לאָזער בירנבּוים און יענ בּרודער דוד פאַר דערלויבן אונדז צו דרוקן דעם 100־יאָריקן מאַטעריאַל, ועלכער איז איצט אזוי וויכטיק אין לעבן פון אונדזער שפּראַך. א האַרציקן דאַנק צו אונדזער לייענער יצחק ראָזאָעל, פאַר מעגלעך מאַכן אונדזער טרעפונג מיט פּראָפעסאָר בירנבּוים.

Dairy-free delights for everyday enjoyment

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Cooking and baking successfully using dairy-free ingredients is always a challenge for the kosher cook, but there are also many people who have to steer clear of dairy ingredients on a daily basis due to lactose intolerance or allergies. Levana Kirschenbaum, restaurateur, chef and cooking instructor, to the rescue!

Kirschenbaum has worked diligently for the last few years to compile a creative collection of luscious recipes made with natural dairy alternatives such as soy, rice, oat, almond and coconut milks. Her new book Levana Cooks Dairy-Free! (Skyhorse Publishing) includes a wide range of both vegetarian and meat fare, including, lasagna, cauliflower au gratin, chicken breasts in mustard cream sauce, ice cream, cheesecakes, truffles and even tiramisu! Kirschenbaum takes into account that most people don't want to spend all day in the kitchen, so she keeps her recipes simple, using fresh, natural ingredients that yield fantastic results without fuss or muss.

Beautiful full-colour photographs accompany each recipe, so if you've had problems with dairy dishes, now you don't have to look at the pictures and dream. It's time to eat and enjoy Kirschenbaum's collection of natural, delicious recipes for your favourite "forbidden" foods!

And if you are planning a trip to New York City, check out Kirschenbaum's cooking classes. For more information, visit her website at www.levanacooks.com.

The roasted tomato soup is a wonderful way to use up the harvest of tomatoes from your garden and it's delicious hot or cold.

LEVANA'S ROASTED TOMATO SOUP

Do not attempt to make this soup with canned tomatoes. Roasting them along with the other vegetables is all you have to do in order to make this soup delicious. Make it when good, ripe tomatoes and basil are plentiful. The flavour of garlic mellows as it roasts.

Roasted Vegetables:
5 lb. tomatoes (7-8 large, or 16 plum), halved
3 heads garlic, points sliced off, leaving the cloves exposed
4 medium red onions, halved
3 red peppers, halved and seeded
1/4 cup olive oil
coarse sea salt to taste

6 cups water
1/4 cup olive oil
1 cup dry white wine
2 cups tomato juice
1/4 cup tomato paste
1 tbsp. paprika
1 cup basil leaves, packed
2 good pinches saffron threads
freshly ground pepper to taste
4 cups soy or other non-dairy milk (rice, almond, grain, oat)

Preheat oven to 450 . Mix the first set of ingredients in a bowl, spread on a cookie sheet, and roast for about 45 minutes, until the vegetables look charred. When the garlic is cool enough to handle but still warm, squeeze the heads until all the pulp is forced out of its skin.

Place all the roasted vegetables, including the garlic pulp, and all the remaining ingredients except the milk, in a wide, heavy pot. Bring to a boil. Reduce the flame to medium and cook, covered, 30 minutes.

Add the milk and cook until just heated through. Cream in a blender or with an immersion blender until perfectly smooth. Adjust seasonings and consistency. Serve hot or chilled. Makes a dozen servings.

CHEESECAKE WITH STRAWBERRY SAUCE

I love all my "babies" but this is one of my greatest triumphs. My daughter Bella recently asked me with great urgency whether I had thought of including this recipe in this book. "Whatever you do, don't forget this one!" she said, smacking her lips and patting her belly. Okay, so no, it is not dietetic food, but it is somewhat leaner and is not laden with cholesterol as is its dairy counterpart. You will never want to go back to the dairy version. The strawberry sauce can be used with many other desserts (ice cream, pound cake, bread pudding, etc.)

Crust:
2 packages graham crackers (about 10 oz. total)
1/3 cup oil

Batter:
4 containers Tofutti brand cream cheese
1 container Tofutti brand sour cream
1/3 cup lemon juice
1/4 cup cornstarch or arrowroot
1 1/4 cups sugar
4 eggs
1 tbsp. vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 375. Make the crust: In a food processor, grind the graham crackers and the oil to a fine powder. Press the ground mixture hard into the bottom of a 10-inch round spring form pan. Bake for 10 minutes. Remove the pan and reduce the temperature to 325.

In a food processor or with an electric mixer, cream all the batter ingredients until smooth (not longer) and pour over the crust. Bake 1 hour and 10 minutes. Turn off the oven and leave the cake inside 2 more hours, without ever opening the oven: Take out and chill completely. Serve alone or with strawberry sauce (recipe follows).

Strawberry Sauce:
1 (12-oz.) bag frozen unsweetened strawberries (or raspberries, strained to remove the seeds)
1 cup cranberry juice
1/4 cup creme de cassis (from liquor stores)
1/4 cup fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp. cornstarch (or potato starch or arrowroot), mixed with a little water until dissolved

Bring all but the last ingredient to a boil. Reduce the flame to low, add the cornstarch mixture and cook, stirring, until just thickened and the mixture is no longer cloudy, about 1 minute.

Puree in a blender or with an immersion blender until smooth. Cool completely before serving. Makes about 3 1/2 cups or 16 servings.

Study identifies Crohn's disease genetic factors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A large-scale international research study, which included Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, recently reported that it has identified 32 genetic factors involved in Crohn's disease.

Dr. Mark Silverberg, staff gastro-enterologist at Mount Sinai and assistant professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, explained that Crohn's is a chronic inflammatory disease of the digestive tract that can cause diarrhea, bloody stools, malnutrition and weight loss, fever, fatigue, bloating and pain.

Dr. Mark Silverberg

There is no cure, he said in an interview.

Together with ulcerative colitis, a chronic inflammatory disease of the rectum and colon, it is one of several conditions referred to as inflammatory bowel disease (IBD).

Jews are four times more susceptible to IBD than a similar group of non-Jews, Silverberg said.

He said Crohn's was not much known until the 1930s, when American gastro-enterologists, including Dr. Burrill Bernard Crohn identified it. It is not clear what happened in the 1930s to make it more prevalent.

Over time, Silverberg added, it became evident to the medical and scientific communities that IBD tends to run in families. In fact, he said, "you find people in the same family having either Crohn's disease or ulcerative colitis."

Large population studies in North America, Britain, France and Belgium discovered one gene involved in IBD in 2001. In 2007, using technologies and techniques from the Human Genome Project (an international research study that mapped all the genes in the human body), 11 more were found.

Investigators decided to probe further, and, by analyzing more than 3,000 people all over the world, found another 21 genetic factors.

"The next step," Silverberg explained, "is to look at each of those genes, discover how an individual gets the disease [not everyone in an affected family gets Crohn's or colitis] and to find what puts people at risk."

The more genes that are isolated, he said, the more likely you are to find out what is going on, and perhaps to find a therapy.

For instance, he said, we may find that a gene or genes may not recognize the healthy, normal bacteria that are present in each person's digestive tract and fight against them.

The goal, Silverberg said, is not to find a cure, but rather to find a way to prevent it, such as with vaccination, probiotics or antibiotics.

Silverberg believes that the studies so far have been so successful because "the team of international researchers has worked together for 12 or 13 years. We collaborate with each other. One person may not get all the glory, but we get much better results."

Israel references crop up in odd places

News last week from the Beijing Olympics and Russia's conflict with Georgia pushed stories from Israel to the margins.

Still, references to Israel emerged from time to time in unusual but instructive, and even disturbing, ways.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For instance, in his in-depth story "Taunting the Bear" for the Week in Review section of Sunday's New York Times (Aug. 10), James Traub examined the complex background that led Russia to attack Georgian forces in the "disputed" breakaway province of South Ossetia and noted the same situation applied to another breakaway province, Abkhazia, in the northwestern part of Georgia. Commenting on the nature of Russian-Georgian hostility, Traub wrote that "[t]he roots of this bitter relationship are deep and entangled, as is practically everything in the archaic world of the Caucuses."

While it would be very misleading to try to draw any historical parallels between the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Russia-Georgia conflict, on one key point about historical complexity, Traub, who visited Georgia and the province of Abkhazia in late June, had the following observation to make: "Talking to the Georgians about Abkhazia, and the Abkhaz about Georgia, was like shuttling between the Israelis and the Palestinians."

To western audiences unfamiliar with Georgian-Russian history, especially with the obscure provinces of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, the competing narratives of both sides are as baffling as those of the Israelis and the Palestinians. However, unlike the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, which is frequently reported in black-and-white terms, some journalists, such as the Toronto Star's Thomas Walkom ("Bear gets eagle's attention" Aug. 13) were anxious to emphasize that, "In moral terms, the [Russian-Georgian] conflict has been typically grey."

Other reporters, such as Samuel Segev in his Aug. 12 Winnipeg Free Press story, "Israel's link to the Georgia-Russian conflict," drew attention to an Israeli connection to the front-page story by describing Israeli arms sales to Georgia. Segev noted that when, in April, Russia shot down "an Israeli-manufactured drone reconnaissance plane" over Abkhazia, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov wrote to Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni protesting Israeli arms deliveries. According to Segev, Russia is using its anger over such arms sales to Georgia as an additional excuse for not restricting its own military sales to Syria and Iran.

Segev explained that Israel's security arrangements with Georgia began, reluctantly, in 1993 when then-Georgian president Eduard Shevardnadze tried to help Israel by inquiring about the fate of Israeli navigator Ron Arad when he, Shevardnadze, visited Iran. In turn, Shevardnadze called on Israel to provide much-needed arms to quell Muslim rebels in Abkhazia, who were being assisted by Russia.

Unlike Segev, who tried to put the Israeli-Georgian relationship into context, well-known writer Misha Glenny ("Georgia on the middle" Globe and Mail, Aug. 14) used the conflict to raise an old hoary allegation. Glenny wrote that "under the influence of an energetic neocon lobby in Washington and with considerable support from Israeli weapons manufacturers and military trainers, [Georgian President Mikheil] Saakashvili and the hawks around him came to believe the farcical proposition that Georgia's armed forces could take on the military might of their northern neighbour in a conventional fight and win."

Thus, in one gratuitous paragraph stuffed with unproven claims, Glenny oversimplifies the reasons for a conflict that has befuddled those who see it in far more complex terms.

Given substantial arms sales to Georgia – including tanks – from Ukraine, among other countries, we might ask what per cent of Georgia's overall supply of military equipment comes from Israel? And precisely who among the U.S. "neo-cons" have been actively pushing Saakashvili toward reckless adventurism?

A special El Al flight landed at Ben Gurion Airport last week carrying returning Israeli holiday and business travelers who had become trapped in the wake of the Russian invasion of Georgia. [Israel photo]

It's disturbing when, without evidence, "Israeli weapons manufacturers and military trainers" and "an energetic neo-con lobby in Washington" – that too-often-used code word for Jewish power – are singled out as the root of evil and much suffering.

The message: protect yourself

Family Matters

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question. I have a single girlfriend who purchased her first home (mortgaged) as an investment many years ago. She agreed to have her new boyfriend, who hasn't worked in more than 25 years, move in as he needed a place to live at the time. After many years of denying rumors, he apparently admitted to being recently engaged to another woman after my girlfriend found a receipt for a diamond ring. He was told to leave immediately. Six months later, after he turned 65, he called my girlfriend to say he loves her and wants to come home, that he's made a mistake.

I am nervous that he might be using her to get half of her house, as this has been a statement he's made around his friends during his absence. This is not the first "affair" he's had since their relationship and he's told other women that he owns this house. He has previously been married twice before. My girlfriend is very hurt, but has stated to me if he makes a commitment (marriage), she might accept him back. Can he marry her for a few months, then demand a divorce with the house as part of the settlement? I don't want to see my girlfriend lose the only thing she has and this is the feeling of many that know both people involved. There are no children in this relationship.

Answer. Just convince your friend to retain a family law lawyer, who will draft a cohabitation agreement or marriage contract. They don't have to get married; the cohabitation agreement automatically becomes a marriage contract once they tie the knot. Once such an agreement is signed, and if the parties have the benefit of a Certificate of Independent Legal Advice and mutual full financial disclosure, then poof: The contract protects her entire interest in the house, if it is properly drafted. If the gentleman, who now appears to have a "change of heart," is truly sincere, then he'll sign. If not, she's found him out.

On the other hand, if he has made some honest financial or indirect investments in the home, he may have some legitimate objections about signing away his rights. Those objections can always be sorted out in negotiations in the way the contract is worded to account for those present and future contributions in the event of another separation or upon death. In making such decisions I always remind clients: Remember for Whom the Bell Tolls, so protect yourself.

Expats return to bid farewell to historic shul

By DAVID BALE
Special to The CJN

SAINT JOHN, N.B. — "Ya'amod re-vee-ee," intoned the gabbai, calling up the next aliyah.

Then he added what you don't usually hear in a Shabbat Torah service.

"Ontario," he called out.

Then, what seemed like half the congregation ascended to the bimah. Like a sea of red plaid, they surrounded the Torah.

The red plaid refers to the kippot that were specially created for this day, bearing the provincial tartan of New Brunswick. Wearing them proudly, a reunited Saint John Jewish community was called up for aliyot in groups by the geographic regions where they now reside.

The swarm of Ontarians comprised the largest contingent to make the physical, as well as symbolic, ascent of returning home to say shalom – goodbye – to the venerable building of Shaarei Zedek Synagogue, their hometown's one and only shul.

The service was part of a three-day reunion held over the August long weekend that saw more than 150 former Saint John Jews arrive from all over Canada and the United States, and from as far away as Australia. The reunion was one last hurrah before the closing of their beloved shul.

The historic building had been the epicentre of their close-knit, small-town communal lives for generations.

Located just blocks from the Saint John Harbour, Shaarei Zedek was sold recently to the city of Saint John. The deal also included the adjacent Saint John Jewish Historical Museum, which before 1986 served as a Jewish community centre and Hebrew school.

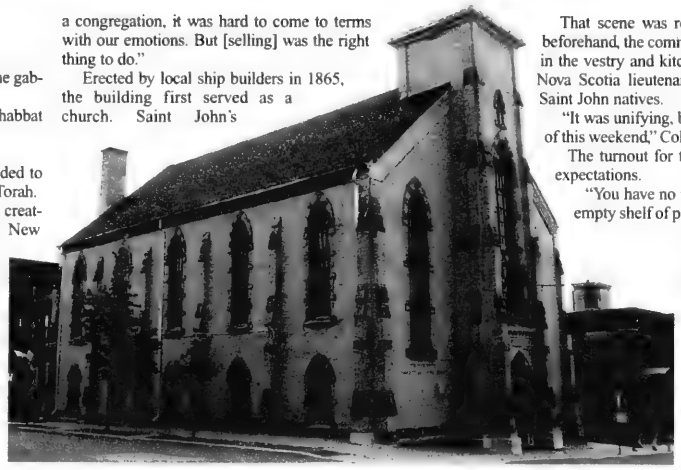
Both buildings will cease operation in November and are slated for demolition to make way for an urban renewal project.

Since the 1950s and 60s, Saint John's Jewish population has dwindled from 300 families to 30 today. Despite strong emotional ties to the building, the unwieldy overhead costs and the challenge of attracting a minyan led to the inevitable decision to sell.

"We knew the path we were on," said Dan Elman, the gabbai who has led prayer services ever since the community lost it's ability to support a full-time rabbi 25 years ago.

"We knew we had to make a choice, and as a board and as a congregation, it was hard to come to terms with our emotions. But [selling] was the right thing to do."

Erected by local ship builders in 1865, the building first served as a church. Saint John's Jewish community, which dates back to 1858 with the arrival of tobacconist Solomon Hart, took possession of the structure in 1919 following an influx of eastern European Jews and the amalgamation of two earlier synagogues.



Shaarei Zedek Synagogue in Saint John, N.B.

Shaarei Zedek became regarded as Atlantic Canada's most beautiful shul.

At first an Orthodox congregation, it later became Conservative egalitarian. But throughout its history, it provided a spiritual centre for a flourishing Jewish presence in New Brunswick's port city.

"My grandson is a sixth-generation Saint Johner," said Senator Ermine Cohen, who was part of the reunion planning committee. "We were blessed to grow up in what was considered the golden years of the synagogue in a huge community that had everything."

The shul was more than merely a place of worship. It was the cultural hub for youth groups, drama clubs, sports teams, and significant family and community milestone life events.

In fact, "because we had only one shul, we've always considered everyone here today as extended family," so, family events became community events, Elman said.

"For years, our bar mitzvahs were famous everywhere, because everything was cooked and baked in the synagogue's kosher kitchen," Cohen said.

"The women would plan menus a couple months in advance, everybody taking responsibility for her specialty, whether it was sweet and sour meatballs, lokshin kugel, tsimmis, or strudel."

That scene was recreated at the reunion. For days beforehand, the community's women busied themselves in the vestry and kitchen, including Cohen and former Nova Scotia lieutenant governor Myra Freeman, both Saint John natives.

"It was unifying, because everyone owned a little bit of this weekend," Cohen said. "This was their simchah."

The turnout for the reunion weekend exceeded all expectations.

"You have no idea how wonderful it is seeing an empty shelf of prayer books," Elman said, referring to the unusually full Shabbat sanctuary.

He added, "I noticed people looking around, upstairs and down, pointing and saying 'This is where Bubbie used to sit, or so and so sat in those rows.'"

"And that's why there were so many tears today," Cohen said. "Because although people have been removed for 25 years and longer, it was like they'd come home and they're losing their shul. They probably belong to another synagogue somewhere else, but they consider this home."

Referring to the reunion's theme, "Shalom Shaarei Zedek," Cohen pointed out that shalom has two additional meanings, other than goodbye. "It means peace, in that we were all in agreement that this was the path we had to take."

It's also a greeting ,and the expat Saint Johners returned just in time to greet the newly purchased building that will replace their shul.

It's a former funeral home, just a few blocks away, where Shaarei Zedek has held funerals in recent years. Smaller and more affordable, it will meet the community's changing needs.

To help with moving and resettling costs, renowned Maritime artist Herzl Kashetsky donated his painting of the interior of Shaarei Zedek for auction.

In one of the more climactic moments of the weekend, the painting sold for $19,000. It's believed the purchaser will want it hung in the new shul.

If the weekend was bittersweet, Cohen focused on the sweet.

"We have a new lease on life," she said, citing developments that could bring new members to the Saint John Jewish community: growth of the local Irving oil refinery, a new power plant, and a new medical school, all currently in the works.

Striking an optimistic tone, she reflected on the difficult decision to sell and move forward.

"It was part of a legacy from our parents, our grandfathers and our great-grandfathers to go on with a Jewish presence in Saint John."

'80 per cent of Georgian Jews think about moving to Israel'

By ANSHEL PFEFFER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TBILISI — Rossiko Harnavi stood at the entrance to the Israeli Embassy in Tbilisi last week, waiting to receive the visa that would enable her to immigrate to Israel. After awhile, a security guard told her to come back the next day.

Harnavi is a resident of the capital, and at the moment, the beefed-up staff was concentrating on applications from Jews who fled from battle zones, many of them with only the clothes on their back.

About 300 Jewish refugees came into Tbilisi this week from the bombarded city of Gori. Most have already filed applications to immigrate to Israel, and 140 have received immigration permits, although normally they would have had to wait a month. Thirty-four had landed in their new country by Thursday morning.

Pleas for rescue have also come from other Georgian cities that have become besieged enclaves in the wake of the Russian army's invasion. But in Tbilisi, where more than 10,000 Jews live, no signs of panic are evident as yet.

Even Harnavi, a 30-year-old English teacher, said she doesn't intend to leave Georgia in the near future. "I just want to have a visa in hand, in case the situation deteriorates."

She said "80 per cent of the Jews are already thinking about leaving," in fear that the Russian army will reach the capital. The embassy, however, says that only a handful of immigration applications have been submitted by Jews from Tbilisi.

Still, a Jewish Agency staffer said, "during the entire last year, only 200 Jews immigrated to Israel from Georgia. Now, we have received nearly the same number of applications in only two days."

The crisis in Georgia has given senior officials at the Jewish Agency, Nativ (the liaison bureau) and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee more work than they have had for many years.

Georgia's 12,000 Jews – the remnant of a splendid community, most of whom have been in Israel for many years already – have become a coveted target. Emissaries have set out from Israel and from locations throughout the former Soviet Union to reinforce the small delegation in Tbilisi.

Meanwhile, however, apart from a few hundred who lost their homes in the fighting, the Jews prefer to remain where they are.

"I'm staying here," said Georgian Reintegration Minister Temor Yakobashvili, who is responsible for liaison with the separatist areas in South Ossetia and Abkhazia. Yakobashvili, who speaks fluent Hebrew, is a former Zionist leader, but he is now more representative of members of the Jewish community who are well connected in Georgia.

"This is a very patriotic community that has strong ties to the local culture and society," said a senior Nativ official. "Their tendency at the moment is to identify with the rest of the Georgian people in the struggle against Russia. But their determination also derives from the belief that in the end, Russia will not attack the city. If the columns of tanks continue to move forward and Tbilisi is attacked, then we'll see a different picture here, and thousands could arrive at the embassy."

Should that happen, an airlift will arrive at Tbilisi or at an airport in a neighbouring country; convoys of buses will transport people to the planes along secured routes; and thousands of Jews will be absorbed simultaneously in absorption centres that will be opened especially for them.

Everything is ready. Only the Jews, at least for the moment, are not showing up.

Iran ready to put Muslim countries' satellites in orbit

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran said on Monday it was ready to help fellow Muslim states launch satellites into orbit after it successfully put a dummy satellite into orbit – a move that may increase western suspicions over its atomic ambitions.

Iran said on Sunday it had put the home-grown dummy satellite into orbit on a domestically made rocket for the first time. The long-range ballistic technology used to put satellites into space can also be used for launching weapons.

Iran says it has no intention to do so.

Head of Iran's aerospace organisation Reza Taghipour said Iran wanted to help Muslim countries to launch satellites.

"I am announcing now that Iran is ready to launch satellites of friendly Islamic countries into space," Taghipour told state television.

Embroiled in a standoff with the West over its nuclear ambitions, Iran in February tested another domestically made rocket as part of its satellite program.

Washington, accusing Iran of aiming to equip missiles with nuclear warheads, called the February test "unfortunate." It cites Iran's missile potential, among others, as the reason why it needs to install an anti-missile defence system in eastern Europe.

France and Russia both said the February test raised the suspicion that Iran was seeking to develop nuclear weapons.

The United States and its European allies fear Iran is trying to obtain nuclear arms under cover of a civilian program. Iran, the world's fourth largest oil producer, insists it needs nuclear technology to generate electricity.

The UN nuclear watchdog body in a report in May expressed "serious concern" over alleged Iranian research into nuclear warheads and said Iran should provide more explanation of questionable missile-related activities.

Iran has so far said it was not the agency's business "to delve into those allegations".

Iran says it has home-grown missiles with a range of 2,000 kilometres, meaning it could hit Israel or U.S. military bases in the Gulf.

Western experts say Iran rarely provides enough details for them to determine the extent of its technological advances, but that much Iranian technology consists of modifications of equipment supplied by China, North Korea and other countries.

Iran has been hit by three rounds of UN sanctions for defying demands that it suspend its uranium-enrichment program. Six major powers are working on another one.

Taghipour said Iran was planning to build and launch more satellites by 2010.

"We are working on these satellites and gradually they will be put into orbit," he told the semi-official Iranian Mehr News Agency.

In related developments, Iran announced last week that its warplanes can reach Israel.

Iranian warplanes now have ranges of up to 1,800 miles, Tehran state television quoted air force chief Ahmad Mighani as saying Sunday.

At their closest points, Israel and Iran are about 500 miles apart.

The report, which gave no technical details, was greeted with skepticism from independent experts who noted that Iran's air force is largely antiquated.

As international scrutiny grows on Iran's nuclear program, its leaders have recently made a series of sabre-rattling comments, apparently in hope of warding off any pre-emptive strikes by Israel or the United States.

Israel's new UN ambassador is a political outsider

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — An exceptional intellect paired with an unflappable exterior are traits Gabriela Shalev's high-powered colleagues and friends say will serve her well when she leaves for New York to become Israel's next ambassador to the United Nations.

Shalev, an internationally renowned law professor, will be the first woman to serve in the post. She was appointed to replace Dan Gillerman.

"She has a strong will and she knows what she is talking about," said Meir Shamgar, a former chief justice of Israel's Supreme Court.

Shamgar first encountered Shalev when she was a student in a course he taught at Hebrew University. A few years later, Shalev joined Shamgar as a colleague on the university's law faculty, where she worked until 2002.

More recently, the two served together on a panel outlining ethics guidelines for cabinet ministers.

Shalev, 67, is an expert in contract law and a political outsider not associated with any party who has been serving as the rector of Ono Academic College near Tel Aviv.

Gabriela Shalev, the new Israeli ambassador to the United Nations

In appointing Shalev, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni indicated that she was determined to put a highly qualified woman in the role.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert reportedly had favoured Alon Pinkas, a former Israeli consul general in New York and a Labor party member.

Some Israeli commentators criticized Livni for picking a political outsider, but Jerusalem Post columnist Calev Ben-David said Livni's choice may work well for the audience that perhaps matters most: international public opinion.

"Livni was justified in wanting a woman for the post for reasons beyond gender advancement: polls show that given Israel's militaristic image abroad, women make the best general impression as our advocates in the international media," Ben-David wrote.

> Women make best impression in international media

Despite some grumbling from the diplomatic corps that one of their own again was passed over for the important position in New York – Gillerman also had been a political outsider until his selection – Shalev's supporters say she is a quick study who will compensate for any foreign policy inexperience with her talents as an orator and a team player.

Shalev declined a request by JTA to be interviewed for this story. Her office said she will not be giving interviews until she assumes her post in New York, ahead of the UN General Assembly opening in September.

The daughter of German Jewish refugees in what was then British Mandate Palestine, Shalev grew up with a strong work ethic. She helped support her family while a student at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, from where she earned a bachelor's degree and a doctorate in law.

She also did post-doctorate work at Harvard University after her husband, an Israeli army officer, was killed in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Shalev raised two young children alone.

"The experiences of Israel are part of her, and she's also paid a price," said Orna Lin, a former student of Shalev's and a good friend.

Lin described Shalev as a relentless worker who also knows how to find time for students and friends, and who can talk as easily about her passions for opera, classical music and art as she can about legal disputes.

This was not the first attempt to draw Shalev into government work. Shalev declined several high-profile posts, including judgeships and the office of attorney general. Nevertheless, she is no stranger to public positions.

Shalev has been a member of the Jewish Agency board of governors and was chair of the Israel Broadcasting Authority.

Shalev has spent time in the United States as a visiting professor at such schools as Tulane University, Temple University and Boston College.

Alan Hoffman, the director general of the Jewish Agency's education department, called Shalev's selection "an inspired choice."

"She has all of the tools to be able to interpret Israel to the nations of the world," Hoffman said. "I think she is unusual in the academic world in that she has not only been a professor but very active publicly."

Lin says Shalev is always calm and in control.

"She can deal with any situation and never seems to be baffled by anything," Lin said. "I think her intelligence will help prevent her from falling into the landmines that await in a place like the UN."

Her predecessor, Gillerman, is a former businessman who, upon leaving his post this summer, was lauded as a seasoned diplomat with excellent rhetorical skills. Observers said Gillerman succeeded in raising Israel's profile at the UN and bolstering its image around the world.

At a farewell party last month for Gillerman, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon offered deep praise for the Israeli envoy's tenure at the world body, noting the "special challenges" of representing Israel.

Shalev will have plenty of challenges awaiting in New York. Most notably, she must navigate the notoriously anti-Israel atmosphere at the United Nations and help push for diplomatic support for Israel's efforts to halt Iran's suspected pursuit of nuclear weapons.

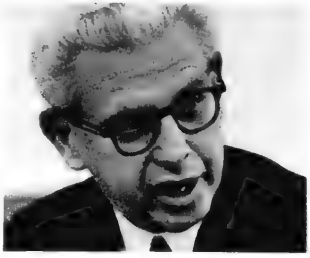
Prominent Jews spied for U.S. against Nazis

JTA

WASHINGTON — Several prominent Jews spied for the United States during World War II, newly released documents show.

Former Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg, philanthropist and businessman Laurence Tisch and baseball player Moe Berg were among the 35,000 men and women whose files from their service in the World War II-era Office of Strategic Services were released last week by the National Archives.

Moe Berg



Arthur Goldberg

The files cover 35,000 Americans, both civilian and military, who worked in some capacity for the intelligence agency , the precursor to the CIA.

Goldberg's file notes that as both a civilian and a member of the army, he supervised a section in the Secret Intelligence Branch of OSS to maintain contact with labour groups and organizations regarded as potential resistance elements in enemy-occupied and enemy countries. He organized anti-Nazi European transportation workers into an extensive intelligence network.

Steve Tilley, director of the textual archives services division of the National Archives, said Jewish Americans of that era might have been particularly attractive as recruits to the agency because of their education and their European background, particularly their knowledge of languages.

TV chef Julia Child and Middle East negotiator Ralph Bunche were among the other names in the records.

Israel Briefs

Land swap on offer?

Israel offered the Palestinians land in the Negev in exchange for West Bank settlement blocs. The idea was part of a draft peace deal that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert presented to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas last week, Ha'aretz reported.

Under the proposal, which was leaked to the newspaper, Israel would keep West Bank settlement blocs, turn the West Bank security fence into a border and evacuate settlers east of it. In exchange for what would be, effectively, an annexation of seven per cent of West Bank land, Israel would cede a parcel of the Negev to the Gaza Strip.

The Negev land would be equivalent to 5.5 per cent of the West Bank. The shortfall would be made up for by a road connecting Gaza and the West Bank, allowing for free Palestinian passage between the territories.

Acceptance of refugees?

Israel reportedly has offered to admit 20,000 Palestinian refugees as part of a final peace accord. As part of U.S.-sponsored talks revived last November, the Olmert government proposed that Israel absorb that number of refugees over a decade, Ha'aretz reported. According to the newspaper, the refugees would be admitted on the basis of "humanitarian" criteria, such as whether they had relatives living in Israel. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office denied the report, saying Israel stands firm in its demand that all Palestinian refugees belong in a future Palestinian state rather than in the Jewish state.

U.S. pressuring Israel?

An Israeli government official dismissed claims that the United States was withholding arms from Israel to dissuade the Jewish state from attacking Iran. The official told JTA that U.S.-Israel negotiations over arms sales are taking place independently of any considerations over Iran. "They're two separate things," the official said, referring to a Ha'aretz report that the United States was withholding arms from Israel for fear they would be used in an attack on Iran. Similarly, the officials dismissed Ha'aretz's speculation that the United States was intensifying its missile defence co-operation with Israel as an incentive against an attack on Iran. "There's ongoing co-operation between us on missile defence, but there's nothing new on that," the official said.

Gaza rockets reach farther

Terrorists in Gaza said a new rocket could reach Ashkelon and Ashdod. The Popular Resistance Committees, the umbrella body for terror groups in Gaza, recently allowed journalists to tour the factories where the Nasser 4 was being manufactured. They said the rocket has a range of about 15 miles, meaning it could reach major population centres along Israel's southern coast. Israeli spokespeople said the manufacture of the rockets could violate the fragile truce Israel forged with Gaza's Hamas rulers two months ago. Popular Resistance Committees spokespeople said they don't expect the truce to last.

'I had to go' to help Israel

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Jerry Rosenberg slides open his balcony door to reveal an array of flowers. A tiny waterfall peeks out from under a shock of herbs and petals while a ceramic frog stands guard. Rosenberg bends over his little garden, pointing out its finer points.

It's hard to believe that 60 years ago, Rosenberg, now 85, was on a boat to Israel, ready to fight for the independence of the new state.

"During the Second World War, people didn't know the truth [about the Holocaust.] It looked like the Arabs were trying to finish the job that the Nazis started," he said. "I decided I had to go."

Rosenberg grew up in Hamilton with his twin sister, two brothers and an older sister.

In the 1930s, Canada was rife with anti-Semitism, he said. "Stores had signs saying, 'No dogs or Jews allowed.'"

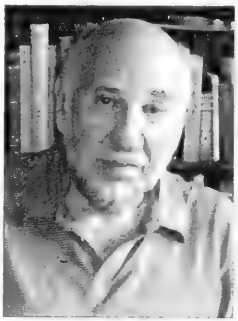
In 1940, when he was just 17, Rosenberg lied about his age to fight in World War II, and he dealt with his fair share of discrimination in the armed forces.

"Most of the crew in the engine rooms in Nova Scotia were brought up on anti-Semitism. When I got talking to them, I changed a few of their minds," he said.

"There was one guy – he was an anti-Semite. He always bugged me. One day, I picked him up and hit him as hard as I could. I sent him flying… I met him again and we were best friends," he said.

Rosenberg joined the navy and spent six years overseas, staying an extra year sweeping for mines in the English Channel.

Back home, however, "it wasn't long before the troubles in Palestine were getting to me," he said.



Rosenberg, now 85, left for Israel only two years after coming back from fighting in World War II.

Two years after returning, Rosenberg approached the Canadian Zionist Organization about volunteering to fight in Israel.

He soon found that getting to Israel wouldn't be easy.

"I was fortunate enough to already have a passport. The Canadian government made it very difficult to get passports. Nobody was happy guys were going over."

Rosenberg took a train to Montreal and then another train to New York, being careful to keep the purpose of his trip a secret, even from his parents.

"I told them that I was going to New York for a week or so. Then I wrote them a letter from France and Haifa," he said.

From New York, he sailed to the north of France with 18 other Machal volunteers for training.

"We used one gun as a weapon to train. Every time it was pulled out, the general guard came by and we needed to hide it. We pretended to be farmers," he said.

After training, Rosenberg and his fellow Machalniks left for Israel on a ship called Kedma, meaning forwards in Hebrew. When the ship landed in Haifa in late February or early March of 1948, a long table of British officials had been set up to greet them and check their documents.

Rosenberg joined the Haganah, the underground defence forces that reported to the Jewish Agency, and fought in the first platoon of the 52nd Givati Regiment.

It wasn't long before he got a taste of his first battle in Basheet village near Yavne.

With little more than one machine gun, a 14-inch mortar, rifles from World War I and a few grenades, Rosenberg's platoon, along with others from the Haganah, fought off the opposition.

"It was just around sun-up, and we were all embedded down in the yard. It was pretty stinky," he said. "All night the bullets were firing."

One soldier, a Hungarian who had served in the British army during World War II, made the first move.

"Around sun-up, he swore at them in English. It confused them… Then we attacked," Rosenberg said.

It was during this battle that Rosenberg saw his commander, nicknamed "El Dube," get shot three times but refuse to leave.

"He wouldn't leave until the situation was secure. When I saw him last, he was blue," he said, adding that he met him again years later and he was healthy.

On May 14, when David Ben-Gurion declared the state of Israel, Rosenberg and his platoon were in the middle of a battle. Rosenberg only found out about the declaration later, but didn't really comprehend its importance until years later.

"It was only years afterward that it was able to sink in – we had a Jewish state for the first time in 2,000 years," he said.

After awhile, Rosenberg's platoon was broken up and he decided to join the Israeli navy. Because of his experience in World War II, Rosenberg became a communications officer and helped build codes and ciphers.

"The ships I served in [in World War II] had difficulties in communication. Israeli ships were equipped with radio telephones," he said. "You don't fool around at sea."

He was stationed on the Josiah Wedgewood, a ship that was sent to disrupt land communications in the Lebanese city of Tyre. Rosenberg's ship was also involved in the sinking of the Emir Farouk, an Egyptian ship carrying 500 soldiers who were trying to stop Israel from capturing the Negev and the roads to Eilat.

One of the most controversial incidents the Wedgewood was involved in was the Altalena operation.

The Altalena was a ship armed with weapons for Irgun, a right-wing Jewish underground force that refused to merge with the pre-state militia. When Ben-Gurion learned of the shipment of weapons, he demanded that the Altalena hand them over to the government. This order was ignored, and on June 22, when the ship neared Tel Aviv, Ben-Gurion sent orders to the Wedgewood to fire at the Altalena.

"The ship was armed by the French, they were bringing the ship into Israel during a truce, it didn't look good. They landed halfway between Tel Aviv and Haifa and we were ordered to make sure the ship didn't pull out," Rosenberg said.

"The landing ship can move up right onto the land. If they had done that, there would have been a terrible battle."

The Altalena was sunk before it got to shore.

Around 1949, Rosenberg, prompted by the Israel Defence Forces in his area, began preparing to leave Israel.

"I spent almost a year teaching naval cadets in Haifa. [The IDF thought] we were an impediment. They wanted us out. They kept saying, 'When are you going home?'

"We were stopping them from getting advanced," he said. "It was a different situation. Things were coming back to normal."

When Rosenberg came back to Canada, the adjustment wasn't easy.

"I got a suit from Tip-Top Tailors and tried to get back into normal, civilian life. After eight years of war, it's difficult."

After the war, Rosenberg, who has a son living in Haifa, a daughter, four grandchildren and two great-grandchildren, worked with Jewish organizations. He currently speaks at schools about his war experiences and has joined some Birthright Israel trips.

In his Toronto home, Rosenberg holds out an old newspaper article about a memorial to those who fought in 1948. He smiles proudly as he reads the headline, which is a quote from Yitzhak Rabin: "They came to us when we needed them most."

Need Help with the University Application Process?

Approaching application deadlines. Personal statements. Preparing for interviews. Distinguishing yourself from the crowd. It can all seem overwhelming.

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many undergraduate and professional programs including medicine, law, business and dentistry, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Since applications to postsecondary schools have doubled in the last ten years, gaining admission to university requires careful planning – even for students with impressive credentials. No aspect of the application process can be overlooked.

Expert advice can make the process less daunting, allowing students to maximize their chances of success. We work one-on-one with our clients throughout the application process. The result is the strongest application possible, one that highlights each student's unique character and individual strengths.

You can do it.

The Academy For Gifted Children – P.A.C.E.

The Academy for Gifted Children - P.A.C.E. is the only private school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E, is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers programs from Grade 1 through Grade 12. In addition to the basic skills, P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction, and a more complex approach to learning. A fully balanced program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program. Please call the school for registration information: 905-773-0997.

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

Seven years ago, after a long career as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents. Since then, she has worked with over 500 students on their way to academic success.

Judy Libman advises each student as a unique individual: no "one-size-fits-all" answers here. For high school students, Libman identifies university or college programs that will provide the best match for a student's interests, goals and learning style. Her familiarity with programs in Ontario and across Canada gives students a wide range of choices.

Libman is also well-known for her expert counseling in US college admissions. She serves as a consultant for US college admissions at several top Toronto private schools.

For students already in university, Libman provides advising on career options, graduate programs, and professional school admissions. Her longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Judy Libman also counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows how to work with both students and institutions to overcome barriers.

For more information on Ambitions Educational Consulting, visit www.ambitions.ca or phone 416-780-0288 for an appointment.

Judy Libman • ambitions educational consulting

The hardest questions in school aren't on the exam.

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

Expert individual educational counselling for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

Oraynu – A Sunday School Families Love!

"My son really looks forward to Sunday mornings."

This comment is typical of the parents whose children attend Oraynu. We teach Jewish history and culture from a Humanistic perspective, focusing on values.

Children are truly engaged at Oraynu and learn through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches.

The children "do" and "act" through lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education events, tzedakah projects, music, Hebrew, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of fun.

"My daughter feels good about being Jewish."

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is enjoyable as the children experience positive affirmations of their Jewishness in every class.

"The B'nai Mitzvah blew me away. I was so moved by the ceremony."

Imagine a B'nai Mitzvah program where students choose their own projects, based on modern Jewish heroes, ancient sages, humour, authors, anti-semitism, etc. Individual ceremonies are offered; Torah reading is optional.

If your family is secular and looking for a school that feels right, perhaps you belong at Oraynu. Intercultural families are very welcome.

Hebrew U students develop cholera-prevention program

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hebrew University of Jerusalem students have developed a cholera-prevention program that has been adopted by the Red Cross in Kenya.

They are also working toward having it institutionalized by Kenya's Ministry of Public Health and Sanitation.

The students, who are medical and public health practitioners from North and South America, Africa, Asia and Europe, have been studying in Israel in the one-year international master's program in public health at the Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School's Braun School of Public Health and Community Medicine.

As part of the program, the 27 students in the class were split into groups to develop a scientifically sound prevention program in one of the countries represented in the team. One group out of seven chose to shine a light on cholera – a disease that student team leader Solomon Nzioka said doesn't get the attention it deserves.

"If HIV is a national disaster, hence justifying its wide global attention, cholera and other diarrheal diseases are a generational disaster that kills children under the age of five in larger proportions than any other known cause in Africa," said Nzioka, who is from Kenya.

He said that cholera outbreaks, which are usually the result of flooding that contaminates water supplies or a result of seepage from latrines into wells, is a bigger problem than HIV.

He said the most vulnerable age group to cholera is children under the age of five and that it is the cause of 75 per cent of disease-related deaths in developing countries.

"This creates a vicious cycle where a country's development potential is affected adversely owing to the big loss of [the] young generation… HIV is now a chronic disease courtesy of scientific advancements in the last 10 years. In essence, cholera is a world notifiable disease [contagious diseases that must be reported by a physician] in the class of anthrax, ebola, SARS and other hemorrhagic fevers, since it spreads like bush fire," Nzioka said.

He added that one of the biggest challenges in beating this disease is to depoliticize and destigmatize it. Many cases are unreported because government officials fear economic loss in tourism.

"Politization and stigmatization of cholera has kept it away from national and international agendas, and as a result, nobody is providing a sustainable financing option to stamp out cholera," he said.

"NGOs go the way of international interests, and I will dare say that in Kenya, cholera has never received the kind of attention that it deserves. If the media publicity efforts seen in the case of HIV could be replicated to stop cholera, governments will listen and stigma will be gone, just like it happened with HIV when everybody started talking about it."

The system Nzioka and his team developed was used effectively by the Red Cross in refugee camps during the recent political crisis in Kenya. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement (IFRC) are also working to implement the program beyond the camps.

Solomon Nzioka

The students have applied for funding from Kenya's Ministry of Public Health and Sanitation, with help from the World Health Organization in Kenya, in the hopes of institutionalizing the program.

According to the Hebrew University website, "if funding is secured, the students expect that in three years' time, the program will increase access to safe drinking water from 47 to 80 per cent; raise awareness about cholera epidemics; upgrade early-response systems; and prevent spread of cholera in the district through the strengthening of partnerships between community and government levels."

The students also have ambitions to bring the program to other countries, including Nigeria and Ethiopia, where cholera is also prevalent.

The key to the success of this program, Nzioka said, is to create partnerships with the international community and to make fighting cholera a priority.

"We now know that donors will stop, listen and act to the cry of young innocent African children who are dying due to a cause which they should not be dying of in the 21st century with all the world potential there is today," he said.

"This is where the Hebrew University Cholera Program starts, but it is useless if it does not find mutual partnerships in the world media with whom together they can shout out on behalf of the voiceless African children."

Toronto neighbourhoods, public transit, inspire award-winning book

By RUTH MESTECHKIN
Special to The CJN

Author Rebecca Rosenblum was washing her hands in a movie theatre washroom recently, when she spied a pair of 17-year-old girls emerging from the stalls. She watched them swap whispers, yelps and hugs. Then they approached Rosenblum and asked her for a tampon.

The moment was commonplace. But it's the incidental individuals who strike her – the people who aren't a part of her life, but simply step in.

"We have this moment, and I don't know if those girls remember it, but it definitely hit me really hard," Rosenblum says. "And the fact that we live in this world and we're missing 90 per cent of what goes on. But sometimes you get a little glimpse of what other people's lives are like."

Rosenblum, 30, records these moments in her blog, Rose-coloured (rebecca-rosenblum.blogspot.com). But most thrilling for her now is her forthcoming first collection of short stories, Once, to be published by Biblioasis. Once won the Metcalf-Rooke award for best new work. Her win was announced last fall, incidentally at a reading for another book.

"It was for a Diana Kuprel translation of I Wrote Stone, and I was enjoying that. And at the end they announced that I had won and everybody clapped and turned and looked at me, and I'm like... hi," she says sheepishly, re-enacting a hand-wave with a laugh. "It was a nice moment."

Rosenblum, originally from Mount Hope, Ont., a farming community outside of Hamilton, Ont., currently lives in Toronto. She moved to the city in 2003 and finished her master of arts in creative writing at the University of Toronto. She credits certain city elements such as public transit and neighbourhoods for inspiring her tales in Once, due to be launched on Sept. 15. But the stories are also anchored to the characters.

"I think it's a lot about being young and wondering what comes next," she says. "And being uncertain and feeling like you don't necessarily know where you fit or what's going on or what you should do. That's really an overgeneralization, but I think in all the stories there's a sense of that, a sense of that kind of confusion."

Some authors use autobiographical material for their work. But Rosenblum tends to stray from this practice.

"I get very wrapped up in what actually happened, and what everyone would feel like if they knew I was writing about them. And that takes a really long time to work through," she says.

Rosenblum often dreams up a situation that is removed from her, but she transposes her emotional experiences into it. And although she says her imagination only extends so far, she is not afraid to take on challenges. In the fall, she will have Linh Lai, a short story written from the perspective of a Vietnamese immigrant, published in the New Quarterly.

"To a certain extent, I did do research for it, but it was more an act of empathy. And it's an artistic challenge to write around the things I don't know," she says. "The more experience, the more I can write. But the more I grow as an artist, the more I can write."

Rosenblum uses her non-fiction blog to push her limits, too. She says she tends to become self-conscious when expressing her opinions. Through her blog, she sharpens her reviewing and criticism skills, writing about movies and music and doing restaurant reviews. Blogging, for Rosenblum, is a way of setting low stakes.

"No one has to read it, no one's paying for it – if they're bored they can go away," she says. "But at the same time, to write for an audience and try to tell them what I think, in some way that's interesting and meaningful. So it's my attempt to learn to write non-fiction. So far, so good!"

The encumbrances don't stop short at non-fiction writing, either. Rosenblum's genre of choice is the short story, but the literary media often dismisses the genre as ready to peter off and perish. She says there's much talk about the difficulty of selling short stories, because people want a novel, where the piece is centred on one single thing – and the thinking goes that if you like the first page, you'll probably like the rest.

"The short story is something different, because it's more various and there's more freedom in 15 pages to do something wild or something weird, or something very intense, because you don't have to sustain it for 200 pages. And there's a lot of freedom in that artistically," Rosenblum says. "I don't know how easy or how hard it is to sell, but I think it's wonderful to read and wonderful to write, and I wouldn't want to see it go. But I don't think that could ever happen."

Rosenblum's stories have appeared in the journals The Danforth Review, Exile Quarterly and Coming Attractions.

Every time she puts the pen to the page, she says she's very particular about reaching for the perfect word.

"And that's one of the pleasures of my job – that I can think about words all day. And I think about grammar, I think about commas," she says. "I don't think an artist would ever think that 'brushstroke doesn't matter.' I think that writers think that way about 'buts' and 'ands' and 'semicolons.'"

Although Rosenblum has landed several successes this year, she admits she does feel nervous about trying new things. And one particular blog post notes that the song That's Not My Name by the Ting Tings – a song about a girl who's always getting her name forgotten – makes her feel less alone and anonymous. She says in certain circumstances, she does feel this way.

"I float around and no one's really sure who I am," says Rosenblum. "I think that's why anybody writes, why anybody tries to put their own experience on paper or into music, in the hopes that there's someone else out there who's struggling with this stuff and we can do it together. I'm really interested if anyone's going to relate to this stuff. I really hope so."

The book launch for Once is Sept. 15 at the Gladstone Hotel, 1214 Queen St. W., a This is Not A Reading Series event presented by Pages Books.

Rebecca Rosenblum is the Metcalf-Rooke award winner for her debut collection of short stories titled Once which is scheduled for release next month.

A microscopic examination of Richler's life and letters

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A new critical biography of Mordecai Richler by Reinhold Kramer, a Manitoba English professor, offers an engaging, thorough and microscopic examination of the life and letters of the iconic Canadian Jewish novelist and essayist, complete with some penetrating psychological insights.

In researching Mordecai Richler: Leaving St. Urbain (McGill-Queen's University Press), Kramer attained access to never-before published material from the Richler archive. He spent months studying the contents of some 265 boxes of papers, letters and other documents on deposit at the University of Calgary. He also attained the co-operation, if not outright blessing, of various Richler family members.

One of Kramer's well-demonstrated theses is that Richler rarely strayed far from his own life experiences in his fiction. As this astute literary biographer puts it, "No matter what sophisticated literary structures Richler built on top of his foundations, the foundations were almost always roman à clef."

Richler's family and circle of cognoscenti knew this only too well. His mother, Lily, was shocked upon reading Joshua Then and Now that Mordecai had made the protagonist's mother a strip-teaser, and nothing could persuade her that he hadn't been writing about her.

"Can you imagine, he said I was a strip-teaser!" she would tell people. When Richler's first quality novel, Son of a Smaller Hero, appeared in 1955, his literary associate, author Brian Moore, scolded him that there were "too many real people" in it.

Indeed, Kramer presents a handy chart indicating that the novel's protagonist Noah Adler is really Richler, Noah's father is really Richler's father, Noah's mother is really Richler's mother, and so on. Richler's famous grandfather, Rabbi Yudel Rosenberg, an author and Hebrew scholar in his own right, is also represented.

To punish her five-year-old boy, Richler's mother once called Eatons department store and, with Mordecai listening, told them that she wanted "to exchange my bad little boy for a nice girl." As an adult, Richler acted on a reciprocal impulse and all but cut his mother out of his life. Kramer marshals all the considerable evidence at his disposal to examine the author's thorny and uncomfortable relationship with his mother and how it presented itself in his fiction.

As an interesting revelation, Kramer uncovers the manuscript of an early novel called The Rotten People, an "unpublishable" book about unlikeable people doing ugly things; he calls it "a very bad novel." Richler, a brash and talented youngster in his early 20s, was writing about his family and the people, mostly Jewish, that he knew. Because of the unresolved anger towards his mother that he carried throughout his life, maternal figures in Richler's fiction often come to bad ends.

As Kramer observes, Son of a Smaller Hero marked the second time that Richler killed off his mother in fiction.

That novel also marked Richler's first success as a writer. A virtual unknown, he turned up at a literary agent's office in Paris in 1954, "strange, wild-eyed, diffident with a great big manuscript under his arm." The agent "read the book that very night and claims to have jumped out of her chair at the recognition of both his talent and the impossibility of getting the mammoth published," Kramer writes.

"The next morning she phoned and said, 'Young man you should not know such words at your age.'" But she took the book and helped him "rein in the excesses of his style" and find a publisher.

Kramer observes that Richler's early writing ranges "from a somewhat romanticized Sholom Aleichem voice, to a clipped version of Callaghan and Hemingway, to a very showy attempt at avant-garde colloquialism."

Eventually, he meshed "formal literary qualities with a colloquiality rooted in Yiddish inflections and English everyday speech." Although Richler tended towards bohemianism in his footloose Paris days, he discovered that, if he wanted to survive as a writer, he could not cut himself free from the St. Urbain Street domain of his past.

In 1947, the teenaged Richler belonged to a Zionist organization and marched in a rally down Saint Catherine Street, waving Israel flags, singing Am Yisrael Chai, and dancing the horah. Several years later, needing a complete break with his past, he began his long self-imposed exile in Paris, Ibiza and London. Still, he became famous satirizing and ridiculing the Jewish world he had known in acclaimed novels such as The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (1959), St. Urbain's Horseman (1971) and Solomon Gursky Was Here (1989).

The irony of his life was that all roads led him back to the Jewish Montreal he had tried so hard to escape, which would always comprise the essence of his internal landscape.

The author of much ephemeral magazine satire, Richler sometimes found himself in a catch-22 situation because editors who admired his work because "it didn't reproduce middle-class Anglo-Saxon" values sometimes told him they'd had their fill of satire on the Jews.

Richler moved back home to Montreal in the 1970s and redefined himself in the 1980s as a highly visible opponent of the Parti Québécois, ridiculing the undemocratic and risible wiles of the separatist movement in international forums such as the New Yorker magazine. In a chapter titled Tongue Trooper, Kramer observes that Richler turned polemical and fiery around 1988.

"In the late 1980s and throughout the 1990s, no fiction writer was more significant in the Canadian polity than Richler," he writes. "While his stance alienated many Québécois, his federalist political involvement made him a truly national figure, in a way that no mere novel could do. Montreal's Jews began to invite him to Jewish book fairs and even to father-and-son breakfasts. Once the prodigal son of Montreal Jews, he now starred on the 'lox-and-bagel circuit.'"

Several good books have appeared on Richler in recent years, including Joel Yanofsky's fanciful Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of a Kind and Michael Posner's engrossing oral history, The Last Angry Man: Mordecai Richler. With Mordecai Richler: Leaving St. Urbain, Reinhold Kramer brings Richler scholarship to a much higher level. The book is diligently researched, well balanced, critically nuanced and well written. While it offers much more information than casual readers will require, scholars and diehard Richler fans will find it highly informative and entertaining.

THREE WORTH READING

Some years back, during a visit to New York, my flight home was cancelled due to an intense winter snowstorm, and I stayed an extra night at the leading luxury hotel that had been hosting my visit. As luck would have it, a gathering of travel writers was scheduled for the same hotel that evening. The participants, intrepid souls that they were, all showed up; and I, a displaced but kindred soul from Canada, was invited to mingle with them.

Standing at a window overlooking snowy Manhattan with an eggnog cocktail in hand, I began chatting with travel writer Tania Grossinger, who was soon engrossing me with tales from her colourful childhood at Grossinger's, the famed Catskills resort operated by a cousin of hers.

Tania's story has long been available in hardcover, but Skyhorse Publishing has just released her book Growing Up at Grossinger's in paperback. It makes great reading and perfectly evokes the backstage drama that went on at one of the most popular Jewish resorts in America of the 1950s and after.

Another current title that I'm enjoying is Evil of the Age: The Charles St. Clair Chronicles, by the prolific Winnipeg writer-historian Allan Levine. The book is set in New York of 1871 and represents the first in a new series of mysteries. Levine has evidently retired his previous hero, Sam Klein, who was featured in a series of mysteries set in Winnipeg. Hopefully, the more universal setting of the Big Apple will draw in more readers.

Sidura Ludwig, our former colleague at The Canadian Jewish News, has made a bold foray into the literary world with a first novel, Holding My Breath (Key Porter). It is now available in Canada in paperback (Tindal Street) and has been released in the United States by Shaye Areheart Books. The story is a poignant coming-of-age tale told from the point of view of Beth Levy, the youngest in a household of two generations of strong Jewish women. The setting is the Jewish community in Winnipeg in the decades after World War II. The book has received enthusiastic praise.

Agent changed Hollywood for better

By BYRON PASCOE AND PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

In 2006, a Hollywood icon opened his sprawling Beverly Hills office to two Canadian guys who wanted to spend time with a legend.

Obituary

There was no reason for him to agree to our phone interview request or to meet us later in Los Angeles, but he did and was a complete mensch. He was smart, funny, supportive, classy and warm, and we knew we were in the company of someone who's lived out his dreams and changed Hollywood for the better.

Bernie Brillstein

We spent an hour with Bernie Brillstein, one of Hollywood's greatest managers, pioneers and moguls, and were impressed by his charming style, quick one-liner jokes and insight.

On Aug. 7, Brillstein died of the complications of heart disease. Many Hollywood tributes have since followed for the man who helped give several Canadians, including Jewish performers, the opportunity to shine, among them Jim Henson, John Belushi, Lorne Michaels, Dan Akroyd and Martin Short.

"Canadian talent is halfway between the U.S. and England. Canadian sense of humour is really off. It's very different, and if you get it, you have a real good time," Brillstein said.

"Marty Short is a great talent and family man. I watch him and I'm in awe. He is so talented and nice. Lorne as well. They are my friends, and I happen to be in business with them," Brillstein told us.

He grew up in Manhattan, playing ball, going to camp and school, and being introduced to show-business people through his uncle, the comedian Jack Pearl. After college and the army, he worked at the talent agency William Morris. At 24, he read letters being sent from executive to executive, to learn the business.

"You know the show How To Succeed in Business?, I actually did that. I came in at 8 a.m., the bosses came in at 8:15. I opened my tie, walked around and bumped into them. They'd ask what I'm doing there so early. I'd say, 'There's so much to do,'" Brillstein said.

After nine years at William Morris, he worked for Management III until 1969, when he founded the Brillstein Company. Its first packaged television show was Hee Haw. The company's other television credits include The Muppet Show and Saturday Night Live, and it was involved with the films Ghostbusters, The Blues Brothers and Dragnet.

In 1991, Brillstein joined Brad Grey to form Brillstein-Grey Entertainment. Brillstein-Grey created the television series Just Shoot Me, Politically Incorrect with Bill Maher and The Sopranos. The company also manages the actors Brad Pitt, Jennifer Aniston, Nick Cage and Adam Sandler.

"We're not dealing with widgets. We're dealing in bodies, minds, and it's very hard. You can't do it well if you just do it for money," Brillstein said.

He was also on the speakers' circuit. "I speak at every agency mailroom and every college that they want me to go to. You've got to give back, that's why I wrote the books. Where Did I Go Right?: You're No One in Hollywood Unless Someone Wants You Dead; Little Stuff Matters Most; and It's All Lies and That's the Truth summarize what it means to succeed today using a true old Hollywood style," he said.

Brillstein loved his work. "How can you be so lucky to be in this business? I mean honest to God, I've been in it 51 years, and I've had so much fun and met so many people. Where do you get the chance to live a life like this and enjoy coming to work each day – it's fantastic," he said.

"When The Muppets exploded and Jim Henson became a worldwide genius and I knew I had something to do with it – you can't get that feeling from anything except a fantastic love affair that lasts a whole life. The good news is my obituary has already been written, and I don't have to bother. They'll say things I never did but that's fine," Brillstein said.

Local artist takes on human rights violators

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Using nothing but his guitar, his voice and some web savvy, a Toronto singer-songwriter and playwright is taking on human rights violators against the backdrop of the Beijing Olympics.

Evan Malach

On the first day of the 2008 Olympics, Evan Malach, 23, launched the Revolution Rising Campaign, a grassroots affair using the "powerful vehicle of the protest song" to raise awareness of the plight of Tibet, Darfur and Burma.

"My grandparents survived the Holocaust, and they taught me to stand up for other people," Malach said. "If China wants the spotlight shone on them, then they also have to show what's been going on in Tibet."

With the help of his friends and fellow musicians – Daniel Sadowski on lead guitar and backup vocals and Johnny Simmen on percussion and backup vocals – Malach went into studio and cut three tracks for the Revolution Rising CD he released for the cause last week.

Malach has set up sites on Facebook and MySpace to promote the campaign and said that any money collected from the sale of the album and from general donations will be distributed to charities working in Tibet, Darfur and Burma through Amnesty International.

The goal is to raise $1 for every 50 people who join the group or listen to one of the songs, and have 500,000 people become fans of Revolution Rising's Facebook site by this time next year.

He penned three acoustic guitar-driven songs – Revolution Rising, Bittersweet Democracy and Celebrate – over the past two years. The lyrics for Revolution Rising are an indictment of the West's lack of response to the atrocities occurring in the affected areas.

"So what will you do for the poor/ Being raped and ravaged in Darfur?/ Will you take action or sit secure…?/ There's a revolution rising," Malach sings on the title track.

Since putting the project together and releasing the songs online on Aug. 8, Malach said the response has been "amazing."

"We have more than 300 people on Facebook, with many taking part in an online dialogue. The response online has been just unbelievable," he said.

He added: "We've raised a lot of awareness. Any money we raise is a bonus, but we want people to know the details of the situation in Darfur, Tibet and Burma."

To that effect, both the Facebook and MySpace sites for Revolution Rising contain links to and information about the three countries and their struggles.

Malach said he wrote the song Revolution Rising after leading a Birthright trip in 2007, during which he met a refugee from Darfur and "looked into his eyes. It was the most haunting experience."

The cover of Revolution Rising, Evan Malach's newly released CD

The album is being backed by Malach's production company, Infinite Potential Productions, which he founded last year.

Despite being the point person, Malach insists the Revolution Rising Campaign is not a one-man show.

"It's a team effort. It's too important to handle on my own," he said. "And my parents have given me the freedom to explore my interests. They've been very supportive… I'm not getting much income out of it."

Malach views the campaign as an extension of his belief in tikkun olam and said the whole project is "being done with a Jewish consciousness."

Still, he admitted that some of the dialogue on the Facebook site has turned confrontational, with certain people posting vitriol about his campaign's lack of focus on the plight of Palestinians.

"I've been getting really challenged, but it's been a good debate," Malach said.

Malach said he hopes the Revolution Rising Campaign will expand its reach by recruiting other artists to contribute to the cause. He'll be playing benefit concerts in support of the campaign over the next month.

Plans are also in the works to record a full-length album of protest songs.

Audition-weary Toronto actor produces a play

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Adam Korson is not the type of actor to sit around and wait for success.

Tired of auditioning for the few available roles in the Toronto theatre scene, Korson decided to produce a play instead.

"It's so tough in Toronto as an actor. You don't have the same opportunities as in L.A.," he said. "With theatre, it's hard. There are only so many characters to play. I'm not one to wait. I thought, 'Let me get off my butt and do it myself.' A lot of times, if you don't make it happen yourself, it won't happen."

Adam Korson, the producer of the play Closer, which opens at the Annex Theatre on Aug. 19.

With the help of first-time director Stephanie Sinclair, Korson is acting in Closer, which he is also producing. The play, which was written by Patrick Marber and adapted into a movie starring Natalie Portman in 2004, is about the complexities of two relationships. Filled with sex, cheating and a search for meaning, the play immediately caught Korson's attention.

"It's a great play. It's blunt, it doesn't sugar-coat. It's very honest. The characters have depth to them," he said.

In Closer, Korson plays Dan, an obituary writer who cheats on his girlfriend. "Dan felt that he had no voice as a novelist – he went for the safe route," Korson said of his character's job.

Korson said Dan falls in love with the idea of love.

Korson, who said he couldn't imagine cheating on his girlfriend, had a difficult time relating to the character.

"In one part of the play, Dan tells [his girlfriend, Alice] that he's leaving her. To be with someone for two years and cheat, I don't understand that," he said.

Even so, he was drawn to Dan.

"Humanity is what draws me to characters like that. There's so much depth to him, he's so lost," he said. "In the play, everyone's cheating," he said.

For Korson, it was difficult not to get lost in his character.

"The human mind is such a delicate thing. There is a line, if you go too far past that line, it's dangerous. I get lost in all my characters," he said. "I truly believe that, as an actor, you can't understand the character if you don't understand yourself."

Korson is what the acting world would call a triple threat. He graduated top of his class from the Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts, where he excelled in dance, singing and acting. His theatre experience includes starring in The Book of Liz and The Mystery of Edwin Drood. He has also appeared in various television and film roles, including The Nature of the Beast and Breakfast with Scot. When not acting, Korson works as an MC for Sole Power Productions, a Toronto entertainment, production, management and promotions company.

A Jewish boy who grew up in Toronto, Korson believes that not all Jewish audiences will enjoy the play.

"The stories are very universal. I think the modern Jewish person will enjoy it," he said. "I think that Orthodox Jews will not see it, they'll walk out. I grew up in a Conservative Jewish home. When you marry someone in the Jewish religion, or in general, that's for life. When you cheat, that's big."

Korson agrees that the play may push the envelope, but he's not apologizing for it.

"What art does, it taps into those places you don't really want to talk about. As an actor, in art, you don't want to do what is deemed to be the right way of doing things. Artists… take people to places that aren't comfortable."

Closer is at the Annex Theatre from Aug. 19 to 22 and from Aug. 26 to 29. For tickets, call 416-419-2865.

Actor/playwright performs klezmer musical at Ashkenaz

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

In the late 1970s, Allan Merovitz heard about James Keegstra, an Alberta high school teacher who denied the Holocaust in the classroom.

Merovitz's first reaction was anger; his next was to write a play.

"I think from that moment, I was pretty determined to try and do something. My background was in theatre," he said. "I had an idea that I would merge my personal history and family history. This would be my little contribution to Canadian theatre."

Around 1978, Merovitz, whose family left Kishinev, Moldova, in 1903 to settle in Canada, started interviewing family members.

"I basically travelled to Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Smith Falls, Ont. The outcome was a shoebox full of cassette tapes. From that I pieced together this show," he said.

The show was originally titled Zaide Didn't Want To Be a Soldier, but later turned into If Cows Could Fly, based on a dream that his dairy farmer cousin had.

The one-man musical follows Merovitz's family from Poland, Lithuania and Kishinev to western Europe and Smith Falls.

Armed with little more than a background screen, Merovitz flits from character to character, portraying everyone from his zaide, who escaped conscription from the Russian army, to his Uncle Hy, a war hero and demolition expert.

For Ron Weihs, the director of If Cows Could Fly, dealing with so many different characters in a one-man show was a challenge.

"Every time that a character comes in, that character has to be there," he said. "It doesn't seem like a one-man show because [Allan's] such a good storyteller. He makes all these different people come alive."

In 1999, Merovitz approached Weihs, the co-founder of Artword Theatre, for help developing the script. With Weihs and his Artword Theatre co-founder Judith Sandiford, who is also the designer for Merovitz's play, If Cows Could Fly was the first production to run at the Artword Theatre's location in Hamilton, Ont., in 2000.

While Merovitz's play was a response to ignorance about the Holocaust, it is by no means a Holocaust play.

"There's hardly any mention of the Holocaust. I did that intentionally. I didn't want to draw up the bogeyman. Yet it's there, in the music and the stories. These are Jews, not Greeks," he said.

Merovitz believes that his play reflects many Canadian values.

"I think it's an especially important Canadian kind of statement. We're multicultural. I just see it right now as a very universal kind of Canadian [play.] The show just happens to focus on the plight of Jews," he said. "The reality is that all of us are immigrants here."

Apart from his play, Merovitz also sings with various klezmer bands, including Chutzpah, Hou Tsa Tsa and his own band, the KlezMerovitz.

If Cows Could Fly is steeped in Yiddish culture and klezmer music.

"I grew up speaking Yiddish. I knew quite a few older Yiddish folk songs. My great-grandmother had sung to me in Yiddish. I incorporated some of those older folk songs into the show," he said.

Merovitz is joined on stage with a klezmer band made up of Henri Oppenheim on accordion, Frank Rackow on clarinet and Weihs on fiddle.

It was with Weihs' encouragement that Merovitz turned the play into a musical.

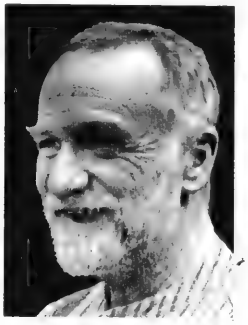
"The songs are so good and they tell the story so well. The songs represent different ways of looking at Jewish culture," Weihs said.

Merovitz agreed.

"Klezmer music is a wonderful sound scape for the different scenes and emotions and the internal psychological psyche that is working through the play," Merovitz said.

While the show's time frame includes two world wars, Merovitz was careful to keep it light.

"I know it's very much a family show, it's not a heavy show for kids. We do not focus on the oppression, we focus on the journey and how people adapt and move and adjust to new situations," he said. "Darkness is never a direct statement."



Allan Merovitz performs his one-man musical If Cows Could Fly at the Ashkenaz Festival on Aug. 31 and Sept. 1.

Merovitz will be taking his play to the Ashkenaz Festival this year.

"I would hope that [the audience] would come away with some history. They'll hear some beautiful klezmer and Yiddish music, and some tunes perhaps they've never heard before and some stories that I know will tickle their fancy," he said.

If Cows Could Fly is on at the Studio Theatre on Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. Tickets are $15 in advance, $18 day of. Contact the Harbourfront Centre box office at 416-973-4000 or online at www.harbourfrontcentre.com. For more information, visit www.ifcowscouldfly.com.

Director's film debunks Iraqi stereotypes.

Documentary depicts Iraqi Jews before 1970

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Twelve years ago when film director Joe Balass was watching home movies from the 1960s taken in his birthplace of Iraq, he was astonished to see women in miniskirts dancing the twist.

"When I first saw the home movie and saw the dancing, it was a bit of a shock. I couldn't put two and two together in terms of what I had known or heard about Iraq – and then this footage stood in such stark contrast to everything I had imagined about the country," said Balass, director of the documentaries The Devil in the Holy Water and Nana, George and Me.

Joe Balass

"I didn't think of Iraq as such a progressive place and I didn't think of it as such a liberal place, and dancing the twist in miniskirts seemed completely at odds with everything I had thought about the country," said Balass, who left Iraq when he was four years old.

For Balass, the dancing became representative of the community finding comfort at a time when Jews were singled out. After 1967, his father was imprisoned three times just because he was Jewish. Balass' mother, Valentine, put her life on the line to free her husband, and in 1970, the family left Iraq.

Four years ago, Balass decided to make Baghdad Twist, to give people a different image of Iraq and to reveal the country's recent past.

Focusing on the period before 1970, the film shows what it was like for Jews living in a multicultural Middle Eastern country. It also gives context to the present-day situation in the Middle East and honours his mother's story.

Baghdad Twist, directed by Balass and produced by Germaine Ying Gee Wong of the National Film Board, will be shown at the Toronto International Film Festival, which takes place Sept. 4 to 13. It consists of archival footage, photos, home movies and an interview with the filmmaker's mother. Although she does not appear on camera, her voice is heard as she shares memories with her son about life as an Iraqi Jew.

"For me, [the film] is a story about Iraq. It's a story about an exile and it's a story about memory. I wanted to convey the notion of how we construct our sense of identity and our sense of history through oral transmission and through fragments we come across as we grow up," Balass said from his Montreal office at Compass Productions.

"I want to underline [that] it's important to talk about Jews from the Middle East as Arab Jews, and for me the idea is to bring people together. I think the situation in the Middle East is really polarized, and one advantage that we have here in Canada is we can have dialogue between people."

At one time there were 180,000 Jews in Iraq, mostly living in Baghdad, with some in northern Iraq and the remainder in Basra, Balass' mother says in the film, but as Jews began to fear for their lives, the numbers diminished greatly.

In a recent New York Times article, it was reported that the Jewish Agency for Israel estimates the number of Jewish Iraqis is seven, fewer than the10 men required for a minyan.

Jewish U.S. swimmers haul in medals

JTA

Jewish American swimmer Dara Torres won two more silver medals in Beijing.

Torres won the medals Sunday in the women's 500-metre freestyle and 4x100 medley relay.

Two more Jewish American swimmers, Jason Lezak and Garrett Weber-Gale, each added a second gold medal. Lezak joined Michael Phelps and two teammates to win the men's 4x100 medley relay final. Weber-Gale competed in the heat that led to the final.

Israeli athletes did not fare as well Sunday. Alex Shatilov finished last in the men's floor exercise final, the only apparatus final the Israeli gymnast qualified for in the Beijing Games.

Shatilov fell on his final landing, and received a score of 14.125 after a .400 penalty. The gold medalist in the event was Zou Kai of China with a total score of 16.050.

Shooter Doron Egozi finished 36th, while Gil Simkovitch finished 38th, in the men's 50m rifle 3 positions event. Shooters Guy Starik and Simkovich also competed Friday in the men's 50m rifle prone qualification round, but neither advanced to the final. Starik came in 12th with a score of 594, while Simkovich was 22nd with 592 points. This finish was an improvement on Starik's Athens finish of 16th. He joins sailor Yoel Selais as the only Israelis to compete in four Olympics.

Israeli windsurfer Shahar Zubari, who was leading in first place after five races, slipped to third place after his seventh race in the men's RS:X competition. Zubari finished 17th in Race 5, sixth in Race 6, and 19th in Race 7. He was able to maintain a first place position after Race 5 because he is allowed to drop his worst performance, but after continuing to perform outside of first place, he no longer retains his top rank.

Israeli windsurfer Maayan Davidovitch is 14th in the women's RS:X competition after seven races.

Israeli sailing duo Nike Kornecki and Vered Bouskila finished their eighth race in first place, and moved up to third in the women's 470 two-person dinghy event. With two more races until the top 10 boats in the fleet qualify for the medal race Monday, the Israeli pair looks solid for advancement.

Last week, Israel's top judoka, Arik Zeevi, was knocked out of the Olympics.

Zeevi, who took a bronze medal at the 2004 Athens Games in the under-100 kilogram category, lost two fights Aug. 14, in Beijing, effectively ending Israel's hopes of a strong showing in judo.

Weeping at his losses, the former European champion told Israeli journalists that he might quit professional sports.

Maccabi Tel Aviv signs ex-Raptor for $5M

JTA

Maccabi Tel Aviv signed an NBA free agent in what is being called the richest transaction in team history.

Carlos Arroyo, 29, a veteran guard who played last season with the Orlando Magic, inked a three-year contract Monday that will pay him an estimated $2.5 million net next season ESPN.com reported.

Sources said the contract had an opt-out clause if Arroyo wanted to return to the NBA.

Maccabi coach Effi Birenboim appeared Sunday on Israel's national sports network, Sport5, to tout the deal.

Arroyo, a standout on the Puerto Rico national team that upset the United States in the 2004 Olympics, became the eighth player who was in the National Basketball Association last season to sign with an overseas club since free agency began July 1.

He averaged 6.9 points and 3.5 assists for the Magic last season in 62 games, but appeared in only four of Orlando's 10 playoff games.

Another ex-NBA performer, Rodney White, signed recently with the high-profile Maccabi club, which has a tradition of excellence.

The path to safety

By MICHAEL GORDON

My favourite summer recreational pastime is cycling. I am not a great cyclist – perhaps I should say I don't do serious bicycle riding. On a good morning, I might cycle 30 to 40 kilometres, preferably on cycle paths. I do not like cycling in traffic.

On a recent outing on the Don Valley cycle path, where you can get to the Beaches from North York with almost no exposure to traffic, I was struck by the number of older cyclists on the path. For a geriatrician like myself, this was very satisfying. But something stood out quite dramatically – many of the people I saw were not wearing helmets.

The Senior Side of Life

When the first few passed me, I thought, "It's an anomaly – they should know better – maybe I should stop them and give them some unsolicited advice."

I reconsidered, however, and realized that such a move would likely not be welcome. It didn't matter that I was a geriatric medicine specialist, this was a matter of "choice," or so it would seem.

Still, as more and more rode by, I wondered what was going on. Of interest was that most of the un-helmeted cyclists were wearing hats to protect themselves from the sun, some quite elaborate affairs with wide brims, others the more durable Tilley types. I was willing to bet the riders had all slathered on sunscreen to protect their aging skin from the wrath of the sun's rays, and that they had bottles of water to protect them from the dreaded dehydration.

It made me think about how people look at the idea of risk. In my office practice, I often have patients and their families ask me about the side effects and risks of medications that I am recommending for some medical condition, one which may be serious or disabling and for which a medication holds a reasonable promise of benefit. Sometimes the drug, although not life-saving can have a profound beneficial impact on the condition. Sometimes a surgical procedure is in question, one that might relieve serious symptoms or prevent some awful event such as a bowel obstruction.

Understandably, when the issue of risk of treatment comes up, I try to alleviate anxiety and fear by presenting the benefits and risks in an equation that shows the balance to be on the side of treatment. For most people it works.

With that intrinsic concern about avoiding harm in most people, I wonder what kind of "blanking out" an informed senior would have to do to get on a bicycle without a helmet. We are not talking about an unusual procedure – most of the younger people on the path were wearing helmets.

The fact that a previous premier of Ontario rescinded a law requiring helmets because of some principle of individual choice is besides the point. Most people understand, for example, that the law related to seat belts is in place as part of public safety policy. Maybe older people assume that because they used to cycle without a helmet when they were younger, or because they are not racing, it doesn't matter. I know, professionally and personally, that it does.

Some years ago while cycling on the same Don Valley cycle path, I took a sharp turn over a bridge – a turn I had taken hundreds of times previously – but with a small amount of rain that had fallen, my wheel skidded and I went head first into the steel and wood railing. I was stunned, my helmet was cracked, but I escaped what likely would have been a serious head injury.

The message at every age: wear a helmet when cycling, for your sake and for your family's sake!

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

A Family Business for over 60 Years

A conference that revived spirits

Epi on Education

I am travelling to CAJE 33 in Vermont and it brings back memories. The Conference for Alternatives in Jewish Education, which is very much a product of my generation of Jewish educators, was born 33 years ago at Brown University in Providence, R.I.

Seymour Epstein

At the time, I was only seven years into my teaching career, but I was already very cognizant of some of the problems we faced as educators. Many of us were grossly underpaid, others were undertrained, and all of us were aware of the low status that Hebrew teachers had in society.

Curricular material was mostly unavailable, and what did exist was of poor quality. Even though Canada was an exception, most North American Jewish education was part-time, as were the teaching jobs. It was difficult for many of us to see ourselves as professionals.

CAJE came about with revolutionary zeal to cure all that. The rapid growth of the organization from a few score to several thousand gave us hope. As an aside, there was considerable resistance to CAJE from the established educational organizations, but one of the great exceptions was the late Rabbi Yitzchak Witty of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education. Rabbi Witty saw the potential in teacher development and in teacher morale, and both attended CAJE himself and encouraged others to do so with travel stipends. He was one of the few establishment educators who attended and understood the CAJE message.

Since that first fledgling conference, thousands have attended annual conferences, taken advantage of CAJE networks, used CAJE publications, and had their teaching spirits revived by being together with an inspiring group of colleagues. While mostly geared to the American model of supplementary education, the growth of day schools has added to the curricular content of CAJE, and educators of every mode of Jewish education can comfortably find their place in many of the hundreds of learning sessions that fill the program.

Even an old veteran like me can learn a new trick or two at CAJE.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Your dream can come true

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Very few people get to live their dream.

Hilliard Conway, however, has realized his dream three times.

A retired businessman who has never taken music lessons but enjoys using a baton to conduct recorded music, Conway has conducted the Toronto Symphony Orchestra three times, although at the age of 98, he says it may not be possible for him to do it again.

Born in 1909, Conway attended King Edward and Ogden public schools and went on to the Central High School of Commerce.

"At that time," he says, "it was very difficult for me to get a job with the name Davie Cohen. I am a kohen and my Hebrew name is Hillel Dovid, so I changed my name to Hilliard Conway."

As a teenager, he worked at odd jobs. His first major job was at the downtown Yonge Street Arcade.

"When customers bought a record, they got a baton. So that's when I decided to conduct music to records, and that's when I first dreamed of leading a symphony orchestra."

He went on to manage three movie theatres, in Toronto, Brampton and Hamilton, and he presented amateur programs at the Colony Theatre in Toronto.

He then worked at Regent Electric on Spadina Road in Forest Hill Village and ultimately bought the appliance store from Oscar Joseph. In the store, which was renamed Hilliard Conway Ltd., he sold black and white televisions, and later sold many people their first colour television, he recalls.

Hilliard Conway when he was guest conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

At the same time, he held onto his dream, and in 1981, the women's auxiliary of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra had a fundraising dinner and a silent auction that included the opportunity to conduct the symphony. He was determined to win the auction.

"I was the highest bidder, and for $1,500, I conducted the symphony at Massey Hall. My dream had come true."

After bidding at two more auctions, in 1984 and 1990, he again became the conductor of the symphony, both times at Roy Thomson Hall.

"I wanted to do it and I went after it hammer and tongs," he says, adding with a smile: "The next two times, the cost had increased, [but] I got a standing ovation each time."

He stresses that if you have a dream and believe in it, "then do it. It has enhanced my life."

Conway, who has been in a wheelchair since he broke his hip some time ago, says that although it is more difficult, he continues to conduct to recorded music from his wheelchair. "I still love it."

He also talks about his other love – his three children, Audrey Mirvish, Richard, and Susan Mitchel, and eight grandchildren.

"The most satisfaction I have in life" he says, emphasizing the words, "is my family.

But he still dreams about conducting the orchestra. "I would like to conduct Scheherazade with the symphony, but it would be very hard from the wheelchair. I don't think I will be able to do it."

When Conway turns 99 on Aug. 26, his family is making him a birthday party.

It may not be with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, but Conway will probably entertain the guests with his baton, conducting to recorded music – perhaps Scheherazade.

Jews warily eye turmoil in Pakistan

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — With control of the world's only nuclear-armed Muslim state up in the air, many Jewish and Israeli observers are watching the political turmoil in Pakistan with unease.

Pervez Musharraf, who resigned as Pakistan's president on Aug. 18, may not have been a great friend of the Jewish People, but he was seen as an ally of the West and a relatively moderate leader of a nuclear state with powerful Islamist elements.

He also had some ties to Jewish groups.

In 2005, Musharraf addressed a Jewish gathering in New York, where he said Pakistan would establish ties with Israel after the Palestinians have a state. During that same visit, Musharraf shook hands with then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon at the UN General Assembly. Musharraf also is rumoured to have exchanged letters of friendship with Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Pervez Musharraf

With Musharraf out, it's not clear whether the open door Jewish organizational leaders have had in Islamabad is in danger of slamming shut.

"It's a big plus for the Jewish People to have an opening to the world's only nuclear-armed Muslim country," David Twersky, senior adviser for international affairs at the American Jewish Congress (AJC), said of the relationship between American Jewish groups and Musharraf. "I hope the idea of being open to American Jews doesn't get thrown out with Musharraf."

AJC chair Jack Rosen, who has shuttled between New York and Islamabad multiple times to meet with Musharraf on issues of Jewish interest, told JTA he's confident that the new government in Pakistan won't sever the country's dialogue with the Jews.

"I know everybody wants to talk about Musharraf the individual, who was at the centre of the stage for the past few years, and everyone wonders what happens next," said Rosen, who is also chair of the Council for World Jewry, which is affiliated with the AJC. "Our reason for having initiated the contact, and his reason, doesn't change with the new administration.

"For moderate Muslim leaders around the world, which includes Pakistan, they want to engage America, they want to engage the West, they want to have a dialogue with members of other faiths. That doesn't falter with Musharraf leaving."

Musharraf's tenure saw the first high-level diplomatic contacts between Israel and Pakistan.

Boaz Mauda

Israeli Idol winner visits Toronto

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

When the winner of A Star Is Born, Israel's version of American Idol, was announced last year, and Boaz Mauda heard his name, his mind went blank.

"I don't remember anything from that moment. They said, 'Boaz Mauda,' and it was a blackout. I remember only flashes, interviews, a lot of people screaming."

Before A Star Is Born, also known as Israeli Idol, Mauda had never performed onstage.

"I first sang when I was a little boy, in the synagogue with my father. In Israeli Idol, it was the first time I came to a stage," he said.

Mauda, now 21, was in the army when a friend of his insisted that he audition for Israeli Idol.

"My friend told me, 'You must go.' My first audition was at 12 a.m., a few weeks after, I had an audition at 11 p.m. There are three levels until the judges. I sang my song and got to the final stage. I was honoured to be loved," he said.

During his first performance, Mauda couldn't help but feel nervous.

"It was complicated. I didn't know how I needed to sing. I could only let my voice out, not perform. It was beyond me," he said. "In the first week, I was very inexperienced, I was under a lot of pressure."

But during one performance, as Mauda looked out over the crowd, he said his dreams flashed before him and he suddenly felt at ease onstage as he began to sing.

"I saw some kind of vision, like I was a big star, and then I said, 'Let's do it.'"

The News in Brief

Canada

Arts Appointment

OTTAWA — Heritage Minister Josée Vermeer has announced that entrepreneur and philanthropist Joseph Rotman is the new chair of the Canada Council for the Arts, replacing former ballerina Karen Kain. An officer of the Order of Canada, Rotman, 73, has been involved in the oil and gas industry, merchant banking and real estate. He is known for supporting numerous institutions, including Baycrest, the Art Gallery of Ontario and Toronto Hospital, and the University of Toronto business school is named for him. The Canada Council funds artists and arts organizations.

Fringe Winner

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Fringe Festival recently named playwright Daniel Thau-Eleff as winner of the Harry S. Rintoul Memorial Award for his play Remember the Night. Thau-Eleff is the first two-time winner of the award. He won previously in 2004 for his one man play, Three Ring Circus: Israel, the Palestinians and My Jewish Identity. The award is given for the best new Manitoba play each year.

Red Cross Questioned

OTTAWA — Senator Jerry Grafstein is asking the Canadian Red Cross to provide information as to any steps undertaken by the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to determine the condition of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. Grafstein has asked the Red Cross to inquire whether the Red Crescent, a member of the ICRC that operates in Palestinian territories, has been enlisted to inquire into Schalit's fate. Schalit was kidnapped in Israel by Hamas and has been held hostage for more than two years.

World

Failure To Launch

WASHINGTON — Iran's test of a satellite launch was a failure, data show. Aviation Week reported that Iran's recent attempt to place a satellite in orbit was unsuccessful, despite Iran's claims to the contrary. Iranian television showed a successful liftoff, the magazine said, but radar and infrared data collected by U.S. armed forces monitoring the launch show that the vehicle spun out of control at higher altitudes.

Rabbis At Convention

DENVER — At least seven rabbis and many other religious figures were expected to play an unprecedented role at this year's Democratic convention in Denver, held last weekend. Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, was scheduled to deliver the invocation on Aug. 28 when Senator Barack Obama was to accept the presidential nomination before a crowd of at least 70,000 at Invesco Stadium. Rabbis from other Jewish streams were also expected to take part in the convention, which kicked off with a multifaith gathering that included scripture readings from Jewish, Christian, Muslim and Buddhist leaders.

Kosher Goes Upscale

BROOKLYN — A kosher supermarket being called the largest in the United States opened in Brooklyn. Pomegranate, an upscale kosher market with valet parking, opened last week in a 20,000-square-foot space in the Midwood section of the New York City borough. The kosher industry newsletter Kosher Today declared the market to be the largest in the country.

God's Name Banned

ROME — The Vatican has reiterated that the tetragrammaton, or four-letter name of God, is not to be pronounced in Roman Catholic liturgy. Bishop Arthur Serratelli, chair of the U.S. Bishops' Committee on Divine Worship, issued a note informing priests of the directive. Serratelli said the official liturgy would not be affected but the ban would have an impact on some hymns and other texts. A message June 29 from the Vatican's Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments noted that the first Christians, following Jewish practice, did not pronounce the four-letter Hebrew name of God.

Rabbis Walk Off Job

POSTVILLE, Iowa — Kosher supervisors at the Agriprocessors meat packing plant temporarily walked off the job last week over reduced pay. A company spokesperson said the pay issue has been "simmering" since the arrest on May 12 of nearly half its workers in an immigration raid. With fewer workers, rabbis have been offered fewer shifts, cutting into their pay.

Extradition Permitted

PERTH — An Australian court has ruled that Charles (Karoly) Zentai is eligible for extradition to Hungary as an alleged Nazi war criminal. Zentai, 86, was released on bail after surrendering his passports. He is accused in Hungary of murdering Peter Balazs, an 18-year-old Budapest Jew who wasn't wearing a mandatory yellow Star of David in 1944. Zentai, who lost an appeal to the nation's highest court in April, is expected to appeal to Home Affairs Minister Bob Debus, who has final authority on Zentai's case. Australia has never extradited an alleged war criminal.

Ads Launched

NEW YORK — The Israel Project is launching a major TV ad campaign to coincide with the Republican and Democratic conventions. Two ads – one focusing on Israel's role in creating energy independence from Middle East oil and the other on Iran's backing for terrorists and its suspected nuclear weapons program – will air 1,300 times over the next two weeks on cable news networks.

Access to Holocaust Archives Requested

OTTAWA — Senator Jerry Grafstein is calling on the federal government to obtain a digital copy of Holocaust-era archives located in Bad Arolsen, Germany.

"The opening of the Holocaust archives in Bad Arolsen is a historic moment," Grafstein said. "It has taken more than 62 years to open the largest remaining Holocaust archive in the world."

Digital copies of the archive's documents have already been transferred to American and Israeli museums and have been made available to survivors and scholars. The move came after members of the International Commission of the International Tracing Service ratified an agreement allowing for greater access to the archives.

In a letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Grafstein asks the government to request copies of the documents as it "would provide some closure to the survivors and their families of this tragic period in world history."

The archive contains approximately 50 million records on the fate of 17.5 million victims of the Nazi regime.

UJA Fed kicks off 2009 campaign with song

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto kicked off its 2009 fundraising campaign in grand style on Aug 19.

Subtitled "The Campaign for Our Jewish Future" the evening saw Israeli Idol winner Boaz Mauda, Canadian chanteuse Amy Sky and conservative Fox News commentator William Kristol converge on Roy Thompson Hall as the evening's special guests.

Sky wrote a new song – One Song, One Voice – to sing in honour of the launch, and it was presented as part of a video montage.

After the opening montage, depicting Israeli and Canadian Jewish imagery set to a stirring soundtrack, Mauda, 21 – the 2007 Israeli Idol winner who was granted special leave from his army service to attend the launch – performed a high-energy set. His first Toronto show was well received by the more than 1,000 people in attendance.

Campaign 2009 co-chairs Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond then reminded the crowd of the federation's mission.

"We continue to energize the Jewish community and generations to come," Wolfond said. "The campaign remains committed to creativity, assisting the vulnerable and connecting Jewish youth with their roots. By joining us here tonight, you are helping us do exactly that."

Fundraising goal for the 2009 campaign is set at $70 million

The fundraising goal for the 2009 campaign is set at $70 million. As of last week, $16 million had already been raised, a federation spokesperson said.

"The Jewish world is changing and we are leaders in helping shape that world," Sonshine said. "We're moving from words into action. But we must raise [the $70 million] to engage in the fight for our Jewish future in full force."

Sonshine and Wolfond asked annual donors to consider increasing their gifts by 10 per cent in order to keep pace with 2009 funding needs.

"We live in a different world today [than a decade ago] when it comes to Jewish security," Wolfond told the crowd. "What will the next 20 years bring? What new threats might emerge and what dreams might inspire our future? To meet our challenges and… goals, we simply cannot accomplish what needs to be done without you."

Federation president Ted Sokolsky briefed the crowd on developments in the Georgian Jewish community. He said the federation's sister organizations – the Jewish Distribution Committee and the Jewish Agency – set up situation rooms and shelters in Georgia and began expediting requests for aliyah from Jews soon after the conflict between Georgia and Russia began earlier this month.

Proceeds from the 2008 JNF Toronto Negev Dinner will assist the development of a JNF park in the Blue Valley, an area on the outskirts of Zefat. The park will serve the needs of local residents and foreign visitors to the area. This unique urban park area will serve not only the needs of the youngsters and adults of Zefat but will function as a "green lung" for that ancient and historic community nestled in the hills of the Galilee.

Columnists focus on peace process, Iran

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

This week, a look at two newspaper columns: one that challenges conventional wisdom on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and another one that seeks to assure us that the Iranian mullahs think like secular liberals.

In "War Without End" (National Post, Aug. 9), Robert Fulford argued that de rigueur talk about an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement distracts us from the harsh reality that no peace is currently possible.

Fulford wrote: "Despite persistent evidence of Palestinian versus Palestinian warfare, and despite the fact that Israel's lame-duck prime minister lacks the credibility to commit the nation to anything, diplomats and politicians continue to dream of making peace between Israel and the Palestinians sometime soon. This diplomatic project has acquired the quality of a dying cult: it runs on an ideology that few believe in but everyone feels obliged to endorse."

He drew attention to U.S. president George W. Bush's Annapolis, Md., initiative with its near-impossible end-of-year deadline for Israelis and Palestinians to achieve a peace agreement, and recalled then-U.S. president Bill Clinton and Israeli defence minister Ehud Barak's futile efforts with Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat at Camp David and Taba in 2000-01. Arafat rejected a peace plan involving Palestinian statehood – violently as it turned out. (Almost a decade ago, the Palestinians were substantially united under a Fatah-dominant PA, while now they are deeply divided between Hamas-controlled Gaza and a greatly weakened Fatah in the West Bank.)

Fulford continued: "War is often called a form of madness. But there's also something crazy in basing diplomacy and politics on a peace that won't happen anytime in the foreseeable future. Speaking the language of peace in these circumstances amounts to mass hypocrisy. For those innocent citizens who believe their leaders and take their words seriously, it's also a cruel delusion."

"Peace is the desire of the world," he concluded, "but idle and bad-faith talk of peace is the opiate of the diplomatic classes."

This is why many Israeli analysts speak increasingly of conflict management rather than conflict resolution, even though the majority of Israelis want to achieve peace with the Palestinians based on significant territorial compromise and security – the very compromise that cannot be achieved in the current climate.

While Fulford takes on conventional wisdom, many western opinion makers are trying to assure us that we have nothing to fear from a nuclear-armed Iran, since it will behave as rationally and responsibly as other nuclear powers have. This again was argued by Bernard Avishai and Reza Aslan in "An Israeli strike on Iran, a plan that just doesn't fly" (Washington Post, Aug. 10).

Avishai and Aslan insisted that "the idea that one fine morning Iran will incinerate Tel Aviv is madness; [Israeli historian Benny] Morris' description of the mullahs' 'fundamentalist, self-sacrificing mindset' is a caricature."

They argued that the Iranian regime will almost certainly never attack Israel with nuclear-armed missiles, as this would leave Iran vulnerable to nuclear retaliation, and expose its "historic cities of Tehran, Qom and Esfahan" to destruction.

Other reasons why Iran will restrain itself, according to Avishai and Aslan, range from wanting to preserve its oil and gas reserves, along with the extensive economic and trade relations surrounding them, to the assumption that "in time" the ultra-conservative mullahs "will bow to internal pressure and open their country to global intellectual capital."

In the end, Avishai and Aslan are saying that since Iran using nuclear weapons against Israel is unimaginable to them, it must be unimaginable to the Iranian regime. This optimistic assessment ignores the fact that history is full of examples of leaders acting in unpredictable ways that defy "our" understanding and expectations.

SeeJN CELEBRATING 60 YEARS OF ISRAEL

WHEN MURDER MARRED THE OLYMPICS

Terrorism marred the Olympic Games in Munich in 1972. Eight terrorists from Black September, a group with ties to Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization, killed two Israelis and took nine others hostage. The attempt by German police to rescue the hostages failed. All nine were killed by the terrorists, while five of the kidnappers were killed in the operation. The remaining three were taken prisoner, only to be released six weeks later when hijackers of a German Lufthansa passenger jet demanded their release. This iconic photo of the massacre shows one of the terrorists on the balcony of the Israeli athletes' quarters. The 11 murdered Israelis were David Berger, Ze'ev Friedman, Yosef Gutfreund, Eliezer Halfin, Yoseph Romano, Amitzur Shapira, Kehat Shorr, Mark Slavin, Andre Spitzer, Yacov Springer and Moshe Weinberg.

Plaque commemorates Christie Pits riot

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

A dark part of Toronto's history was commemorated Aug. 17, when Heritage Toronto unveiled a plaque recalling the riot at Christie Pits park 75 years ago.

At the park, on Aug. 16, 1933, members of the Anglo-Canadian Pit Gang, also known as the Swastika Club, unfurled a large black swastika at the end of a softball game between the St. Peter's team and the Jewish Harbord Playground team.

Outraged, Jewish fans began to attack the gang members, and both sides ran for reinforcements and homemade weapons – baseball bats, broken bottles, bricks, broom handles and boots.

For six hours, the park was filled with hate and blood. Surprisingly, no one was killed.

"The riot that occurred here should be remembered for precisely what it was – one of the worst ethnic riots in this city's history, in which warring youths from two camps... beat each other violently and horribly with whatever weapons they had on hand," Peter Ortved, the chair of the Heritage Toronto Board, said at the ceremony, which took place in Christie Pits park.

While most of Heritage Toronto's plaques celebrate bright moments in the city's history, Ortved said that it is important to remember darker times as well.

"Cities and communities that understand themselves don't just remember the praiseworthy bits in their history. To do so leaves a dangerously lopsided perspective on the past. We are being painfully honest today. We are recognizing that Toronto was once a city which made an anti-Semitic race riot possible," he said.

At the time, Bloor Street was a kind of dividing line for the Jewish community. Jewish and Italian immigrants lived primarily south of Bloor, and British Protestants lived to the north. Both groups used Christie Pits park, located at Christie and Bloor streets.

Cyril Levitt, a sociology professor at McMaster and co-author of The Riot at Christie Pits, said Toronto in the 1930s was a British, Protestant city. About 81 per cent of the population was of British decent.

The riot symbolized the blatant anti-Semitism that was not uncommon in Toronto during the depression.

Signs like "No Jews or dogs allowed" were seen in the city. Jews were barred from certain social clubs, had limitations on admission to educational institutions and couldn't get certain jobs because of their religion.

As the Nazi party came to power in Germany, Toronto locals in the Beaches area formed "swastika clubs" in an effort to ban Jews from some Toronto beaches.

"The Toronto press had carried stories on a daily basis about Hitler's regime. The significance [of the swastika] was not lost on the Jewish youth of the city," Levitt said.

Lionel Mernick, 88, said the plaque was long overdue. He was there the night of the riot, but was too young to participate.

"I wasn't quite 14. I was just watching and making sure the telephone booth was clear. Guys in the Jewish community were waiting for the call. They went down the hill in one line," Mernick said.

While recounting his experience as a Jew in the 1930s, Mernick began to cry.

"It's hard for me to listen," he said of the presentation of the plaque. "For me to see a plaque finally put up, I never thought I'd see the day. As young as I was, I couldn't go into some of the parks. [People] would chase me out. It was a bad time. The riot helped a bit. We were a little stronger."

For many Jews, the story of the Christie Pits riot was passed from generation to generation. Judy Stoffman, the chair of the Christie Pits plaque committee, began noticing references to the riot in literature and decided that it was time for a plaque.

"The event rose from the mud. People were ready – not the initial generation, but their grandchildren," she said. "I just thought that the time was right. It was the last moment people who had been there would be available. It serves as a reminder that there are a few dark passages on the road to multiculturalism."

The plaque will be put up permanently by mid-September.

Jewish day school fees rise by up to 10 per cent

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

As summer turns to fall, parents can expect early mornings, cranky children and higher tuition fees at Jewish day schools – often at amounts that exceed the rate of inflation.

Six of Toronto's seven largest day schools have increased tuition for nursery school to grade 8 by three to 10 per cent for the 2008-2009 school year, although many increases are roughly equal to or slightly less than the rate of inflation. As well, at least one school, the Toronto Heschel School, has limited the increase to one per cent in senior kindergarten, and Netivot HaTorah Day School has frozen tuition for most preschool programs.

According to the Bank of Canada, the annualized rate of inflation in July, the latest month for which data is available, was 3.4 per cent, the highest rate in more than five years.

Associated Hebrew Schools raised tuition by three per cent for half-day nursery and junior kindergarten, from $5,100 to $5,250. Half-day senior kindergarten fees increased four per cent from $5,100 to $5,325. Full-day nursery or junior kindergarten fees went up by three per cent, from $9,950 to $10,250. Full-day senior kindergarten went up by five per cent from $9,950 to $10,400. Fees for grades 1 to 6 rose four per cent from $10,700, to $11,150, while fees for grades 7 to 8 also increased by four per cent, from $10,950 to $11,400.

Bialik Hebrew Day School raised tuition for half-day kindergarten by three per cent, from $5,662 to $5,812. For full-day kindergarten to grade 8, tuition increased three per cent, from $11,325 to $11,625.

Parents of Leo Baeck Day School students will see increases of three per cent for all grades. Nursery and junior kindergarten half-day fees went from $5,225 to $5,375, while full-day junior kindergarten fees rose from $10,450 to $10,750. Senior kindergarten to grade 8 fees also increased from $10,450 to $10,750 for the 2008-2009 school year.

Many increases held to around the rate of inflation

At Netivot, fees in the following grades have stayed the same: morning nursery school, which remained at $3,125; nursery extended, which is $5,633; full-day nursery school, at $8,140; half-day junior kindergarten, which stayed at $5,570, and full-day junior kindergarten, which is still $10,585.

Half-day senior kindergarten fees rose three per cent from $5,570 to $5,710. Full-day senior kindergarten also increased by three per cent from $10,585 to $10,850. Tuition for grades 1 to 3 rose three per cent, from $11,310 to $11,950. Grades 4 to 6 increased by four per cent, from $11,540 to $11,950. Grades 7 to 8 increased five per cent, from $11,540 last year to $12,150 this year.

Heschel's junior kindergarten half-day fees rose by four per cent, from $5,600 to $5,800. Full-day junior kindergarten increased by 10 per cent, from $9,800 last year to $10,800 this year. Senior kindergarten saw a small increase of one per cent, from $13,800 to $13,900. Tuition for grades 1 to 3 rose by six per cent, from $13,800 to $14,600. Grades 4 to 5 increased by six per cent, from $14,000 to $14,800. Tuition for grades 6 to 8 went up by six per cent, from $14,300 to $15,100.

United Synagogue Day School also increased tuition in all grades. Its nursery school fees went from $4,950 to $5,200, a five per cent increase. Half-day kindergarten also went up by five per cent, from $5,500 to $5,750, as did full-day kindergarten, from $11,000 to $11,500. Grade 1 tuition rose from $11,400 last year to $12,150, a seven per cent increase. Grades 2 to 5 increased by four per cent, from $11,900 to $12,400. Grades 6 to 8 went up five per cent, from $11,900 to $12,500.

Calls to Eitz Chaim Day Schools were not returned.

Toronto's two largest Jewish high schools also raised tuition at rates well above inflation. The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto saw a tuition increase of six per cent, from $17,150 last year to $18,200 this year.

The Bnei Akiva high schools saw an increase of seven per cent at both Ulpanot Orot Girls' School and Yeshivat Or Chaim. Tuition went up from $16,900 last year to $18,000 this year.

Dennis Grubbs, interim director of Leo Baeck Day School, said the cost of education increases faster than the rate of inflation.

"All tuition goes up because the cost of living goes up, the compensation of employee base goes up. The cost of education increases much more than the cost of living," he said.

"I've been in the business in the [United] States for 40 years, and education has outpaced inflation almost two to one over that entire span, because somehow its one of the elements of the economy that seems to be on the high end… just like energy."

He added that "in the business of educating children effectively, you never want to be on the low side of what is happening in terms of technology needs, equipment needs, human resources… we need people who have expertise."

Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (known as the Mercaz), said schools set tuition independently. He also noted that the federation provides subsidies for parents who can't afford the fees.

"We're constantly trying to increase [the amount available] to keep up with the cost of tuition," he said.

The federation allocates almost $8 million each year for subsidies. Last year, more than 30 per cent of students that attended federation-funded schools received them.

With great humility, sadness and resolve

Over and over again, without cease or relent, we must ensure that our Armed Forces know of the deep gratitude of the Canadian people for the Forces' hard work, courage and resolve so far away in the harsh, crusted gravel and sun-bleached sand in Afghanistan.

And, of course, they must also know of our equally deep sorrow when, inevitably, they fall in the line of their important duties.

Last week was a particularly difficult week for our soldiers. Three of our troops – Sapper Stephan Stock, Cpl. Dustin Wasden and Sgt. Shawn Eades – were killed and one was injured, when their vehicle hit an improvised explosive device (IED) hidden in the the road they were travelling west of Kandahar.

Since Canadian troops entered Afghanistan in 2002 as part of the NATO mission there, 93 Canadian soldiers and one envoy have been killed.

Our soldiers were killed on the same day that three Polish soldiers were killed in the central part of the country when they hit an IED.

Two days earlier, 10 French soldiers were killed and 21 injured in an ambush about 50 kilometres east of Kabul.

One week before that the Taliban ruthlessly gunned down four aid workers, including two Canadians, not far from Kabul. The vehicle in which the workers were travelling was clearly marked as a civilian vehicle. In fact, the Taliban murderers took great pains to register their kills, breaking the windows of the car before aiming their weapons at their helpless, unarmed victims.

As many observers have noted and as the rising tally of NATO and other western casualties attests, the Taliban seem to have re-grouped and reinvigorated their campaign against Afghan President Hamid Karzai's regime and its NATO allies. Of course, it has also been noted that the Taliban do not restrict their violence to non-Afghans. Their contempt extends to anyone who shows loyalty to the government. And thus, they slaughter Afghans too.

The uncertainty and the confusion surrounding the transition in Pakistan away from the tight, military rule of former president Pervez Musharraf is a perfect circumstance for the Taliban and their supporters in which to augment their forces and extend their bloody reach.

"The work that you're doing here is indispensable," French President Nicolas Sarkozy told his troops in Afghanistan standing in profound melancholy alongside the flag-draped coffins of their fallen comrades. We applaud his words.

And we apply them with similar humility, sadness and resolve to the work of the Canadian Armed Forces. Though so very far from our shores, it is true in every conceivable sense, that they stand on guard for us and indeed for all democracies.

Thus we say to our soldiers thank you, for we are deeply grateful.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin, stunned his cabinet by announcing his intention to step down after six years in office. At 70, Begin was beginning to show the ill effects of depression and stress caused by the death of his wife, and by the unresolved situation in Lebanon, where 517 Israeli soldiers died.

She'arim closing

It was a sad day for Jewish education when the Mercaz (formerly the Board of Jewish Education) and the board of Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School decided to close the school. The closure prompted an outcry and frustration among She'arim parents and non-She'arim parents alike.

In "Debate on closure burdened by misinformation," David Koschitzky, chair of the Board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, rationalized that community funds have to be prioritized with a greater focus on the two-thirds of Jewish children not attending Jewish day schools (CJN, April 10). I replied with a letter to the editor stating that communal funds would better be spent on families whose children are already in the Jewish day school system, thus making Jewish education a priority in their lives ("Don't close She'arim!," May 1). By extension, She'arim was not only a Jewish day school, it was also a "one of a kind outlet" for Jewish children with special needs from diverse religious backgrounds. I suggested that closing She'arim would cause many former She'arim parents to remove their children from the Jewish day school system.

After reading "Mom sees son as 'casualty' of She'arim closing/Parents face difficult choices" (CJN, Aug. 21), I was not surprised, but saddened and dismayed, to read that about 24 per cent of former She'arim children will no longer be attending Jewish day schools. I was further disillusioned by the federation's indicating that they were "very happy" with placing "70 per cent of She'arim children who need to be placed at host schools." The reality is, who knows how many more "casualties" or "new" Jewish children will also not be attending Jewish day schools, as eligibility to this so-called "integration plan" is open only to former She'arim students? Those figures can easily be compounded by parents who have decided to go the public school route rather than have their children be part of an experimental program they feel can never be comparable to She'arim.

As Jewish parents, we are always concerned about the future of our children and grandchildren. Closing Jewish day schools and "losing" children to the public school system can never be positive. Who knows what ripple effect this will have on our Jewish community and the future generations of these children? Will their children re-enter the Jewish day school system?

Toronto community may decline

In his letter of July 16, Rabbi Cory Goldstein wonders why Toronto did not make the list of the top 10 Jewish neighbourhoods in the Jewish Living magazine ("Pluralism of Thornhill community," CJN, July 17). There may be an easy answer to this question: the cost of Jewish education. Although Toronto is blessed with a wide range of fine Jewish day schools, unless one is wealthy, chooses to limit family size, or chooses to forgo day school education, the current tuition situation poses an extremely steep hurdle for Jewish families with school-age children. While it is true that the problem is shared with many communities in the United States, it is to be noted that the situation in Ontario is an anomaly in Canada, where all other provinces with a day school provide some form of provincial assistance. In some parts of the Orthodox community, where family size tends to be larger, a trend of migration of young families out of Toronto is already taking place. As vibrant as the Toronto community seems at the present, if the problem is not addressed head-on in a serious and timely fashion, we may very well find ourselves in a declining community over the coming decades, with fewer people filling our large infrastructure.

Phoenicians didn't invent the alphabet

I wish to correct Alex Gropper's inaccurate and unfortunately widely held idea in an otherwise entertaining article – that the Phoenicians invented the alphabet ("The Phoenicians were Mediterranean catalysts," CJN, Aug. 7). The first non-cuneiform alphabetic writing was found at various sites in Canaan and in the southern Sinai desert and dated, at the earliest, to around 1700 BCE. That script, called proto-Canaanitic, was based on Egyptian hieroglyphic symbols but adapted to represent the sounds of Western Semitic. Proto-Canaanitic evolved into the Phoenician, Hebrew and Aramaic scripts in around the 11th and 10th centuries BCE. When the Greeks interacted with the Phoenicians and adapted their alphabet to write Greek, they may have thought that it was a Phoenician invention. It was not.

I refer Gropper and interested CJN readers to Joseph Naveh's Early History of the Alphabet and Gordon J. Hamilton's The Origins of the West Semitic Alphabet in Egyptian Scripts.

Shalom, lehitra'ot and au revoir Canada

Israeli ambassador says goodbye

By ALAN BAKER

After four years as Israel's ambassador to Canada, the time has come to pack our bags and return to Israel.

In many ways, this is both a sad and happy time. My wife and I are sad to be leaving so many good friends, made during the course of our living in Ottawa, as well as throughout Canada. It is sad to give up an extensive framework of solid political contacts in government, Parliament, and among the leadership and members of the various Canadian communities, especially the Christian and First Nations communities.

It is no less sad to say farewell to the many Jewish communities throughout Canada, large and small, that we have had the honour to visit and who have hosted us in such a warm manner as true family. It is sad to leave Canada after working hard to build up political support and good contacts in Canada's government, and seeing the fruits of such support in the relationship between the present Conservative government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Israel.

We are sad to leave a country endowed with boundless beauty in all its provinces and territories, and a people so warm, welcoming and justifiably proud of their achievements in building such a country.

But, on the other hand, we are intensely happy to be returning to Israel, our home, to our family and friends, and to breathe the air of Israel. We have missed Israel from the first moment of our arrival in Canada, and the dramatic events that have accompanied our presence in Canada – culminating perhaps in the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006 – have only strengthened our longing to be home. We, too, have beauty in our land and intense pride in our achievements.

Above all, it is gratifying for an ambassador to be able to report home that the government of the country to which he or she is accredited solidly supports Israel, both in word and deed. Not many Israeli ambassadors are in the position to do that. I, as ambassador to Canada, have been proud to be able to say that such a development occurred during my term.

No less gratifying for an ambassador is the increase in bilateral commerce between our two countries, both in the public, intergovernmental sector, as well as in the private sector. To this should be added the positive results of a major effort by myself, together with some dedicated people in the Canadian legal and business community, to re-establish the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce as a body intended to facilitate commercial contacts between Canadians and Israelis, with a view to doing good business.

It is equally gratifying to see the supportive Jewish community of Canada that, while not always united internally, nevertheless unites to support Israel and showers affection on Israel's diplomatic representatives. The firm link between Canada's Jews and Israel is an example for all Diaspora Jewry.

However, perhaps one frustration has been an unexplained reticence on the part of some of the major Jewish community organizations and some Israel advocacy groups to maintain anything more than cursory contact with the Israeli embassy and ambassador, in order to mutually and reciprocally exchange views on developments in the respective spheres of activity. Despite efforts to forge such contact, and the resultant updating, co-operation and co-ordination that could be so mutually beneficial – especially in periods of tension in the Middle East – such ties have not materialized and remain an area for improvement.

But in departing Canada, I sense that the most worrying and frustrating specter that is looming upon all of us is the ongoing and continuously growing wave of hostile anti-Israel activity on major Canadian campuses generated by and among the more extreme Muslim and left-wing political organizations. This, regrettably, is now even enveloping some Jewish students and academic staff with its intensity and outreach.

Having attempted to reach most campuses during the course of our travels throughout Canada and to meet and address students in all spheres – Jewish and gentile – and to face this hostility head on, I have observed, over the years, an ever increasing tendency by organized anti-Israel groups to impose their will on university administrations and on the general student population, as well as to propagandize, to prevent open discussion and to insult those who attempt to defend Israel and present positions favouring Israel.

I myself have been subjected to ugly and sometimes insulting and even violent demonstrations and interruptions by these groups.

Today's students are tomorrow's leaders – leaders of Canada, parliamentarians, religious, business and social leaders. Similarly, today's Jewish students are tomorrow's community leaders. Minds and views are moulded during the period of studies at university. The Jewish community has a duty to itself to invest – as the major priority – whatever effort, resources, time and attention are necessary to ensure that Jewish students have the support, tools and basic requirements to be able to face the growing challenges on campus in a proud and confident manner, devoid of fear and apprehension. That means not just financial assistance, but a proactive willingness on the part of all members of the major organizations in the community – including the leadership – to go to the universities, to take part in the debates and demonstrations, to write articles in the press and to give the Jewish student bodies on every campus the active and real support that they need – in word and in deed.

The ongoing introspection involved in the various controversies that divide parts of the community, and the tendency of some major elements within the community to prefer to concentrate on organizing fundraising events for this or that organization, or to honour this or that community leader (which in itself is doubtless important), sometimes has the effect of shadowing or downgrading the gaping need for help on the campuses, as the major community priority.

My call to unite and help the Jewish students in Canadian universities is an earnest and heartfelt appeal, and in my humble opinion, it requires a serious and urgent re-adjustment of community priorities and a united effort by all organizations. The Hebrew expression benafsheynu (in our souls) perhaps well describes the significance and importance of giving priority to the Jewish student bodies on campus.

And so, in departing Canada, our second home, we will be taking a part of Canada with us to Israel. Canada has instilled in us the importance and vitality of a strong and warm Diaspora community as an integral part of our Jewish being and as a reassurance to Israel and Israelis that we are not alone. We remain one large family. Kol Yisrael chaverim!

May Canada and the Canadian Jewish community continue to go from strength to strength.

Shalom, lehitraot and au revoir, Canada.

Alan Baker is Israel's outgoing ambassador to Canada.

Will Uganda come to Israel?

More than a century ago, the Zionist movement rejected Uganda as a Jewish homeland. The Jewish commitment to the Land of Israel has been vindicated. But Uganda may not quite have rejected the Jews. Its Abayudaya region has had an indigenous Jewish community since 1919, spearheaded by a local military leader and renowned elephant hunter. One of its members, Gershom Sizumu, was recently ordained by an American Conservative rabbinic school and now acts as the spiritual leader. He has just opened an egalitarian yeshiva.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Recently, another 250 Ugandans embraced Judaism. An Israeli Conservative mohel travels there periodically to perform circumcisions. Members of my family who visited the community a couple of years ago were impressed by its way of life.

Speaking about the current fascination in Africa with the Abrahamic religions, Rabbi Sizumu said that "the relationship between God and the Jews in the Torah resonates for many spiritual seekers" on the continent. He deemed it essential that Judaism be available to them as an option.

Unlike most Jewish communities in the world, Uganda's Jews are in no position to show their commitment to Israel through philanthropy. In fact, they themselves are in need of financial help. It is, therefore, quite likely that some may decide to come to live in Israel both for religious and economic reasons. But Israel's Chief Rabbinate will probably refuse to acknowledge them as Jews, with the argument that they were converted under Conservative auspices.

Though interpretation of Jewish law may be the rabbinate's formal excuse and religious politics a strong motivation, racism is probably the real reason, as it has been to start with when it came to accepting Jews from other parts of Africa, notably Ethiopia. Many foreign workers would also happily embrace Judaism as an expression of their desire to live permanently in the Jewish state. The latest efforts by the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel to curb conversions should be understood in this light.

Sooner or later, however, decency, common sense and justice will prevail, as will necessity. As aliyah of Jews by birth is declining, Israel will be forced to be more hospitable to Jews by choice, irrespective of the colour of their skin. The current efforts to encourage immigration from western countries have yielded some results, but not enough to assure a Jewish majority in years to come.

Those wishing to establish a conversion procedure in Israel that would enable candidates to be accepted as Jews by one central authority, yet allowed to choose denominational affiliation, have failed so far. But things may change in the future, and the new Jews from Africa may show the way. With a piquant twist of history, Uganda may indeed come to Israel.

A vision of campus life, 10 years hence

Malcolm Dennis is walking to a protest at Carleton University.

An Israeli flag wrapped around his body, he joins a group of friends to walk to the University Centre.

The year is 2018.

The protest is against countries that abuse human rights and is considered the key event of Human Rights Week.

Human Rights Week is a recent development on Canadian campuses. It started as a response to Israel Apartheid Week and was originally called Islamic State Apartheid Week.

Mark Masters in Ottawa

Originally, critics lambasted the event as a veiled attempt by pro-Israel students to unfairly criticize Arab nations. But the name was soon changed to Human Rights Week and broadened to include all human rights abusers in the world, not just the Middle East.

Slowly, Human Rights Week became a staple on campuses as the Jewish Students Association (JSA) linked up with other groups such as Doctors Without Borders and the United Way on Campus to raise awareness of the terrible atrocities happening in the world.

Malcolm carries a sign that reads, "Give women equal rights." It's a response to policies in some countries that severely limit the ability of women to do anything other than what their husbands allow.

The event is part of a tremendous transformation on campus for Jewish students.

Only 10 years ago, anti-Israel and anti-American protests dominated student politics.

There is still a group of radicalized students, but they have been pushed out of the mainstream. Instead, a new student government on campus has endorsed Human Rights Week and even offered funding for the initiative.

The new student association president, Nick Bergamini, will give the keynote speech at the protest.

Bergamini was elected with the help of Jewish students and has always felt indebted to the community. Malcolm was one of several Jewish volunteers on his campaign.

A couple years earlier, Jewish student leaders had put forth a concerted effort to engage their community in campus elections. While Jewish organizations didn't endorse any one political group, they did forge ties with each candidate, ensuring no bridges were burned.

By earning the respect of Bergamini and other campus leaders, the JSA was able to get approval for a new multifaith centre to be built on campus.

The new multifaith centre offers religious groups space to hold events. Every Friday night, the JSA offers a free Shabbat dinner to anyone who wants to attend. The food is provided by community leaders who make generous donations year after year.

The new funding comes as part of a concerted effort by Jewish federations across the country to focus more on campus life in Canada.

Malcolm has attended many of the Shabbat dinners along with his friends in Alpha Epsilon Pi, the Jewish fraternity.

The fraternity is sponsoring a charity event next week. It's called Skate for the Cure and involves a big group of students skating down the Rideau Canal to raise awareness and funds for breast cancer research.

Malcolm is part of the organizing committee for the event, which has become an annual occurrence on the Ottawa calendar. Even the city's mayor drops by each year to officially open the skate.

Malcolm is living in an ideal world for Jewish students.

It took a lot of work by a lot of courageous people, but finally the cycle of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel behaviour on Canadian campuses has been pushed to the periphery.

A few years earlier, Jewish campus leaders decided not to let fear dictate how their community would operate at Carleton and other universities. Instead, Jewish students took a more active role on campus both politically and socially.

It was a long and hard fight. Malcolm still has to deal with one professor who makes off-hand comments about Jews and money, but he quickly reported the person to the top academic body on campus, and the professor has been suspended and is under review.

Malcolm doesn't let the anti-Semitic professor bother him too much. After all, he has a protest to attend and a fundraiser to organize.

What a time to be a Jewish student on a Canadian university campus.

Israel at the Olympics

For a brief 16-day period this month, the eyes of the entire world have been centred on Beijing. The Olympic Games, intended to be about the competition and camaraderie of sport, have increasingly become an arena for social and political demonstration and dissidence.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Amid antagonist calls from both social activists and Olympic purists, the Games have emerged to serve a third purpose beyond both demonstration and competition. They have long acted as a showpiece for involved nations, as participation carries inherent emblematic value.

A showpiece for what, though, is the question.

The United States, keeping with its place at the helm of world politics, has always sought to dominate the competition. China, in lieu of its emergence on the world stage, promised to provide the greatest spectacle the Games has ever seen. Israel, taking part in its 14th Games, has traditionally sought participation for the symbolic value alone – the Israeli flag flying aside the flags of nations the world over served as a legitimizing spotlight on the infant nation. A further goal has recently been set to establish Israel on the map of athletic world achievements with Olympic gold.

Watching the Games this year, though, something has become increasingly clear – Israel, despite its greatest attempts in the Olympic Games, is not like other nations.

Notwithstanding attempts to separate politics from sport, one needs look only to the Iranian delegations treatment of Israeli athletes for proof that political issues often overwhelm sports. For the second Olympics in a row, an Iranian athlete has bowed out of a competition involving an Israeli participant. Four years ago in Athens, Iranian Arash Miresmaeili showed up overweight to a judo match against Israeli Ehud Vaks. This time around, in Beijing, Mohammad Alirezaei of Iran called in sick before a 100-metre breaststroke heat in which Israeli Tom Beeri was competing.

Iranian excuses continue to mount – and they seem to constitute nothing more then an overt boycott of Israeli participation. They might as well blame the dog for eating their Speedo next time for all the plausibility they have garnered in the last two Games. But the fact remains that no Iranian athlete has competed against an Israeli – or even in an event that an Israeli shared – since the Iranian Revolution.

The last several Olympic meets have witnessed Israeli athletes establishing personal and national records, yet their achievements have been slow to translate into podium finishes. These Games represent the highest athletic commitment and the greatest number of athletes that Israel has sent – a whopping 43 participants. The number of delegates sent by other nations, such as Lithuania and Denmark, nearly double the Israeli contingent, while their respective populations represent merely a half and two-thirds of Israel's.

It is not difficult to understand why, either. In a summer that witnessed a much debated prisoner exchange with Hezbollah and another possible upcoming exchange with Fatah, it is no wonder that the best and most gifted Israeli athletes are preoccupied with other domestic issues.

While teenagers the world over spend their nights dreaming of the Olympics and their days training for them, Israeli teenagers prepare for army service. The Olympic motto – faster, higher, stronger – speaks to the spirit of sport and competition involved in the Olympics for aspiring athletes; it could easily be interpreted in Israel to represent the patriotic drive of many joining the armed service.

Only with prolonged peace and stability in the region will Israeli athletes – world-class competitors no doubt – begin contending on an equal playing field with athletes from other nations. I hope that when Canada welcomes the world in general and the Israeli Olympians specifically to Vancouver in 2010, we will greet a much larger Israeli delegation – a delegation that has enjoyed the stability necessary to foster Olympic gold.

Obama woos Jews in race for White House

Barack Hussein Obama, the harbinger of an America in which racial and ethnic minorities will comprise a majority of its population in the future, has broken barriers in this astonishing political season. He soundly defeated Hillary Clinton, a formidable opponent, in the Democratic party primaries and he walked away from this week's Democratic convention in Denver as the party's first African American candidate for president. Come November, he will face John McCain, the Republican candidate, for the greatest prize of all – the presidency of the United States.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But as he sets his sights on the White House, Obama, the liberal U.S. senator from Illinois, must surely wonder whether Jews – one of the most important and influential constituencies in American politics – will vote for him in sufficient numbers to carry him over the top. Judging by a recent survey commissioned by J Street, a Washington-based Israel advocacy organization, he may well have reason to be concerned. The survey found that only 58 per cent of American Jewish voters would definitely support him, while another four per cent said that they were leaning toward him. By contrast, the last Democratic standard-bearer, John Kerry, drew 76 per cent of the Jewish vote, while the previous candidates, Al Gore and Bill Clinton, both garnered about 80 per cent.

So Obama has his work cut out for him, even though he appears to enjoy more support among Jews than among white Christians. Consider these statistics: while more than 80 per cent of black voters have a favourable opinion of Obama, the comparable figure in white America is only about 30 per cent. Clearly, the prospect of a black president conjures up resistance in some quarters.

Nonetheless, Obama cannot take Jewish voters for granted, even though some of his earliest mentors, advisers and supporters are Jewish. Indeed, his candidacy is still dogged by what the mayor of New York City, Michael Bloomberg, recently called a "whisper campaign." Obama, whose mother was a white American Christian from Kansas and whose grandfather was a black Kenyan convert to Islam, has been the object of nasty e-mail messages suggesting that he is a Muslim, sympathizes with radical Islam and is lukewarm to Israel. Residents of southern Florida, home to the second-largest Jewish community in the United States, have been the recipients of many of these messages.

Being an Obama supporter, Bloomberg took the trouble of travelling to Boca Raton to refute these "rumours," which he denounced as "lies" and "wedge politics at its worst." Bloomberg, in comments at the Jewish Federation of South Palm Beach County, urged his listeners to reject the rumours, which have also surfaced in Israel.

Bloomberg's appearance in Boca Raton took place three weeks after Obama sought to assure voters there of his commitment to Israel's security, his opposition to Iran's nuclear program and his view of Hamas as an organization bent on Israel's destruction. Speaking at B'nai Torah Congregation, Obama – a practising Christian whose chief strategist, David Axelrod, is Jewish – also tried to dispel false rumours that he is a Muslim. Realizing that they may undermine his campaign, Obama has yet to schedule a talk at a mosque.

Obama reiterated these themes when he addressed the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's annual policy conference in Washington, D.C. in June. Prior to launching into his speech, he said, "I want to say that I know some provocative e-mails have been circulating throughout Jewish communities across the country. A few of you may have gotten them. They're filled with tall tales and dire warnings about a certain candidate for president. But if anyone has been confused by these e-mails, I want you to know that today I'll be speaking from my heart, and as a true friend of Israel."

Obama proceeded to say that he would work with Israel to pursue a peace agreement with the Palestinians within the context of a two-state solution, and that he would do "everything in his power to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon."

Skeptics in the audience may well have been disarmed when Hillary Clinton, in her speech, said, "Let me be very clear. I know Senator Obama will be a good friend of Israel." For a politician whose pro-Israel credentials are impeccable, Clinton's comment may have had an effect.

Obama has presented himself as a staunch supporter of Israel in speeches and interviews before and since. In what may have been his most definitive observation on Israel, he told The Atlantic magazine: "I think that the idea of a secure Jewish state is a fundamentally just idea, and a necessary idea, given not only world history but the active existence of anti-Semitism."

Yet Obama does not agree with "every action of the state of Israel." He is known to oppose Israeli settlements in the West Bank and he believes that the status of Jerusalem will have to be negotiated in future peace talks.

These caveats aside, Obama is wholeheartedly in Israel's camp, as he demonstrated last month during a visit to Israel and in discussions with the Israeli leadership from Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on down.

He vowed he would not force Israel to make concessions that might jeopardize its security and pledged to preserve the United States' close relationship with Israel.

Prior to going to Jewish state, Obama described Israel as "a valued ally" and promised to maintain Washington's "unshakable commitment to supporting Israel's right and capability to defend itself."

Barack Obama meets Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem

Touring Sderot, a town in the northern Negev that has been hit and traumatized by thousands of Qassam rockets and mortar shells launched from the Gaza Strip, he said that Israel had every right to defend itself against attacks on its civilians.

As for Iran, Obama has said that its nuclear program will be one of his foreign policy priorities as president.

As he put it on the eve of his trip to Israel, "Through its nuclear program, missile capability, meddling in Iraq, support for terrorism and threats against Israel, Iran now poses the greatest strategic challenge to the United States in the region in a generation."

Unlike the Bush administration, Obama wants to engage Iran in "direct and aggressive diplomacy" on the nuclear file. Yet, in a reference to Iran's sabre rattling, he has warned that he will "always leave the threat of military action on the table" to defend Israel.

(Regarding Iraq, Obama has called for a phased withdrawal of U.S. combat troops, arguing that the current insurgency there has diverted the United States from the central front in the war against terrorism, the lawless region along Afghanistan's border with Pakistan. As he wrote in a New York Times op-ed piece, "It was a grave mistake to allow ourselves to be distracted from the fight against Al Qaeda by invading a country that posed no immediate threat and had nothing to do with the 9/11 attacks.")

Despite Obama's efforts to curry favour with Jewish voters, he has yet to win the hearts and minds of skeptical Jews who doubt his commitment to Israel and who worry about his past associations with three figures: the Rev. Jeremiah Wright Jr., a Chicago pastor who has delivered racially and politically charged sermons; Rashid Khalidi, a Palestinian American academic who has spoken on behalf of his people's cause, and Robert Malley, a U.S Mideast expert and former diplomat whose views have offended right-wing Jews.

To the majority of Jews, however, Obama, a man who represents the ascendancy of ethnic and racial minorities in America, comes across as a defender of Israel, a foe of the current regime in Iran, an adversary of Hamas, an advocate of social justice, and a proponent of a responsible and balanced foreign policy in the 21st century.

United Jewish Appeal launches $70 million Campaign

More than 1,000 people gathered for UJA Federation's annual campaign launch at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall on August 19, where they were treated to top entertainers, insightful speakers and a room full of great enthusiasm and spirit.

UJA Campaign 2009 Chairs Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond.

UJA campaign organizers are aiming to see this year's campaign eclipse last year's total of $66 million, and reach the $70 million mark. Last year UJA's total ranked third behind only New York and Chicago.

The evening's highlights included performances by award-winning singer/songwriter Amy Sky and Israel Idol winner Boaz Mauda, who was making his Canadian debut. New York Times columnist and Fox News panelist William Kristol shared his perspective on a number of topics such as the upcoming U.S. election and Canada's role on the international stage.

Campaign chairs Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond stressed the community's role as leaders in the Jewish world.

"We must respond to the unique challenges that we continue to face across the street and across the globe," said Wolfond. "What will the next 10 or 20 years bring? How will technological advances affect the way we and our children interact and live our lives? What new threats to Israel's and our own security might emerge? What dreams will inspire our future?"

"Our spirit of generosity and determination make us leaders in the Jewish world," said Sonshine. "Our Jewish education system is regarded as the best in the world; we have a network of services to assist the most vulnerable in our community that is the envy of North America; we have the highest participation rate in Birthright Israel programs and the most successful Birthright alumni programs anywhere and we have remarkable support for Israel," continued Sonshine.

Campaign to assist those in need Across the Street. Across the Globe.

Ted Sokolsky, President and CEO of UJA Federation offered the audience an update on the critical rescue operation in Georgia, being carried out by UJA Federation partners JAFI (Jewish Agency for Israel) and JDC (Joint Distribution Committee). Within the first 72 hours after the conflict began on August 8, JAFI rescue teams evacuated 200 Jews under fire, processed aliyah applications and placed new olim on planes to Israel. Forty Georgian children have been sent to summer camp in Israel for a week to escape the war. JDC is providing food and humanitarian aid for 2,200 elderly Georgian Jews and 760 children.

"It is your continued support that allowed our partners to react immediately to the crisis in Georgia – to save lives. JDC and JAFI have been in contact with every Jew in Georgia. None is without food, shelter or medicine," said Sokolsky. "UJA Federation is truly making a difference across the street and across the globe."

New Shaarei Shomayim rabbi looks beyond 'labels'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler's enthusiasm for Jewish learning is apparent when he mentions the Gemarah and Talmud class he teaches every morning at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he took over as spiritual leader at the beginning of the month.

"It's early in the morning... at 6:15, but it's a good class," he said in an interview. "It's not me, it's the Gemarah – it's an inspiring section [currently being studied]," he added quickly.

He wants people to know that, even if they can't get up that early, "there's something really great about the opportunity to study Torah," he clarified.

Clear communication is a priority for the 31-year-old rabbi, who in his first sermon implored congregants to let him know about any mistakes he might make so that he could take appropriate action.

He sees his job at Shaarei Shomayim as being, "primarily, to care for the people in the synagogue, to be there for them in their time of need, and to shepherd them through the ups and downs of life, but also to inspire them, and to be a catalyst for personal growth and for family growth as well," he told The CJN.

For his first year, he said, he is making it a priority to get to know the needs of the congregants and begin to form a relationship with them.

In a broader context, he sees the synagogue as being welcoming and non-judgmental to all. He also sees it as "a centre for addressing larger communal issues" as they arise. He said Shaarei Shomayim is an institution that cares for Jews in Toronto, Israel and elsewhere, as well as for the non-Jewish community.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

In his initial sermon, Rabbi Strauchler told congregants they had "much Torah" to learn together, a flag to raise for modern Orthodoxy, a mission to be a light unto the nations, and "wounds to heal within this community."

Rabbi Strauchler, who served Beit Chaverim Synagogue in Westport, Conn., for the past three years, succeeds Rabbi Asher Vale – who served as interim rabbi for the past year following the departure of Rabbi Moshe Shulman – at the modern Orthodox synagogue, which has 840 member units.

The rabbi – whose last name is pronounced "Shtrow (rhymes with how) "-chler" ("ch" as in "Chaim) – said he's not afraid of the term "modern Orthodox.

"I think [the term is] useful in the sense that it reflects the basic problem of every Jew – whether they're Orthodox, not Orthodox, whatever colour or stripe – that modernity is something that is ever present in our lives, and it brings many advantages. It also brings many challenges. In the modern age, you can choose. You can choose to be Jewish, you can choose not to be Jewish. That did not exist before the modern era."

However, Rabbi Strauchler added, he believes that the terms "modern Orthodox" and "Orthodox" are "labels that were imposed upon us by others, and that fundamentally we're Jews. And it's important to be able to see past the labels, towards the right and towards the left, to be able to look at a person and to see the person for what they are, as opposed to the external dress they may have on at that moment."

Rabbi Strauchler, who grew up as one of four children in a modern Orthodox family in West Orange, N.J., has already demonstrated his ability to balance modernity and tradition.

An alumnus of Yeshiva University, Yeshivat Har Etzion and Oxford University, he was a premed science student – following in his parents' footsteps – before switching to English literature. In 2001, he became the first YU graduate to receive Oxford's prestigious Rhodes Scholarship. The rabbi has two master's degrees; one in religion from Oxford, and one in Bible from Yeshiva University.

He credits the legacy of his maternal grandfather, Rabbi Gershon Romanoff with inspiring him to become a rabbi. Rabbi Romanoff studied at Yeshiva University under Rabbi Moshe Soloveichik in the 1930s, and died when Rabbi Strauchler was a year old.

Rabbi Strauchler also said that studying with Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein at Har Etzion was a key formative influence. "His lessons, his example, the sense of responsibility that he demonstrates to the Jews of the world and the world as a whole... came very much alive for me."

Rabbi Strauchler, who is married with three young children, spent three years at the yeshiva; he studied with Rabbi Lichtenstein for two of them.

Commenting on his own eclectic educational background, Rabbi Strauchler said, "You learn from every experience and from every person."

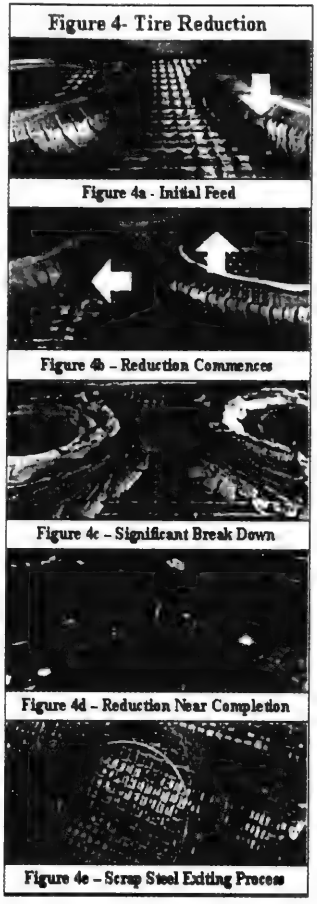
Israeli business interested in tire recycling



Environmental Waste International's reverse polymerization technology breaks down tires into organic materials that can be reused or resold.

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

In light of last year's tire disposal legislation in Israel, some businesses there are becoming interested in a unique technology developed by Environmental Waste International, (EWI).

Located in Ajax, Ont., EWI specializes in waste management technology. The company has developed an environmentally friendly method of recycling tires through a process called reverse polymerization.

Reverse polymerization is a patented technology that breaks down organic compounds into simple molecules. Using this process, tires can be broken down into oil, gas, carbon black and steel, all of which have a commercial value. Reverse polymerization takes place in a nitrogen environment, which prevents any hazardous byproducts.

"Basically, it's a microwave-based technology that uses the microwave energy to literally overpower the molecular bonds of anything that has hydrocarbon or is carbon based," said Stephen Simms, president and CEO of EWI.

Currently, tires make up a large part of waste worldwide. In Israel, around 50,000 tons of waste tires are produced each year.

In early 2007, the Israeli government enacted the tire disposal and recycling law. Under this law, tire producers and importers will be responsible for recycling or disposing 50 per cent of used tires until 2009 and 70 per cent of used tires until 2011. After July 2013, they will be responsible for recycling all used tires. At that time, tire disposal at waste disposal sites will be prohibited.

"A lot of tires end up in illegal dumps or landfills… or are burned for their value as a source of energy. There's a big move both environmentally and politically to move away from burning tires," Simms said.

"In our system, we aren't burning that tire. We're breaking the tire down, gaining back original byproducts… so that the oil can be refined and used as similar to diesel. Carbon can be used in new manufactured rubber products.

"There's always been a need for the technology for tires," Simms said, adding that there hasn't always been interest. "There was an initial excitement in the early '90s when people heard of the company. But it took so many years to develop that it may have created too long a period for people to maintain excitement."

Les Bernstein, who is in charge of corporate development and investor relations at EWI, said the recent interest in this technology comes back to oil prices.

"The idea has been very popular lately because of the high commodity prices we're all paying everywhere. Oil has gone from $25 a barrel to over $130 a barrel," Bernstein said.

"The world's dependency on oil has created interest around the world for technology that will lessen your dependency. As well, it has encouraged projects all around the world to reuse, recycle and be energy efficient."

Apart from tire recycling, EWI also designs systems for waste water sterilization, medical waste reduction and food dehydration. In 2003, EWI received a contract from the United States Department of Agriculture for their liquid biological waste treatment system.

TRD Instrum Ltd., an Israeli manufacturer and developer in the dental field, is another of the companies interested in EWI's reverse polymerization technology. The company has been in talks with EWI, although TRD Instrum Ltd. may not be in the final deal, Simms said.

Stephen Simms, president and CEO of Environmental Waste International, which specializes in environmentally friendly waste management technology. Below: a tire unit.

Like Israel, Ontario is also becoming conscious of the importance of safe tire disposal. Ontarians throw away more than 10 million used tires a year, and only half of these are recycled. Ontario is currently developing a province-wide tire recycling program.

EWI may become involved in this program, Simms said.

"Because we don't have a system ready to take tires, we can't be included as an available processor of tires, but we can be down on the list of developing technology," he said.

While EWI has developed this technology, the company has not yet sold or installed a final commercial version.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Let's link kashrut to ethics

In recent weeks, a debate has erupted on the pages of the New York Times regarding issues of ethical kashrut. While the topic has been on the backburner of many progressive minds for some time, the recent raid on the Agriprocessors kosher slaughterhouse in Postville, Iowa, has brought the question to the fore.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

If we certify the adherence to Jewish ritual laws of kashrut, should we not also certify adherence to Jewish ethical laws?

The case of Agriprocessors raised a number of ethical issues. Several months ago, after an animal rights group published a video of the slaughtering process at the plant, questions were asked relating to tzaar baalei chayim, the Jewish concept of avoiding cruelty to animals. In more recent weeks, after a raid by U.S. immigration officials, questions of workers' rights, illegal immigrants, minimum wage, abuse and even worse have also been asked.

Seth Winberg, a rabbinical student at the liberal Orthodox Yeshivat Chovevei Torah in New York recently wrote that it might very well be "abused workers, some of them children… producing the ritually slaughtered meat eaten at our Shabbat tables."

Activists, most notably the young upstart organization Uri L'tzedek, have advocated a boycott of meat from Agriprocessors and the establishment of a series of criteria for ethical certification. A similar "hechsher tzedek," or "certificate of righteousness" was recently proposed by a group of Conservative rabbis. The certification would be awarded to companies that pay fair wages, ensure workplace safety, follow environmental regulations and treat animals humanely.

In Israel, a system of ethical certification has been in place since 2004. There, Bema'aglei Tzedek, a student-run human rights organization has been offering a Tav Chevrati, a social seal, to restaurants, bakeries and other organizations that meet its criteria, including in employment practices and accessibility for the disabled.

When I go out to eat in Israel, I now look for two certificates – one for kashrut and one that covers social practices.

The critique of these systems of ethical certification is twofold. First, while there are clear benchmarks for standards of kashrut, similar standards are not as easily identified on issues of ethics. Second, the standards for workers' rights, minimum wage and other issues are the domain of government enforcement. The Orthodox Union, the kashrut certifier of Agriprocessors, has taken a "wait-and-see" policy, electing to wait for U.S. immigration and justice officials to complete their review before taking action.

In my mind, however, these critiques are not enough. It's time we took a stand not only on issues of ritual law, but on matters of ethical practice as well.

We are fortunate in Toronto and elsewhere to have reliable kashrut councils that are unanimously respected for their supervision of the ritual laws of kashrut. In some cities with multiple regulatory bodies, disagreements regularly erupt over which certifications follow which intricacies of the laws of kashrut.

Our zeal for mitzvot ben adam l'Makom – commandments involving the relationship between human and God – must be equalled by strict adherence to mitzvot ben adam l'chavero – between people. In our understanding of the laws of kashrut and many other aspects of Jewish life, there are times that we become so engrossed in one kind of mitzvot that we neglect our responsibility for the other kind.

While relatively little meat from the Agriprocessors plant crosses the border into Canada, its warning call certainly does. With Labour Day quickly approaching, it's incumbent upon us to learn a lesson from the suffering of the workers in Postville. It's time for kashrut regulators to welcome, if not insist on, the introduction of ethical certification. And it's time for us, as consumers, to take a more active stance in knowing the origin of our food and insist that the companies we do business with are socially responsible.

Simchovitch writes with sensitivity, compassion

The Fiery Mountain – Collected Poems, A Bilingual Edition, Volume II*, by Simcha Simchovitch.

Yiddish is at least 1,000 years old. In its earliest form, it was one of the dialects of Middle High German spoken by Jews in the Rhineland. Following the pogroms of the Crusades, many Jews fled to eastern Europe, bearing Yiddish with them as part of their cultural baggage. The flight of Jews eastward reached its zenith in the middle of the 14th century, owing to the massacres that resulted from the terror of the black plague.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Written in Hebrew letters, Yiddish gradually incorporated Hebrew words of a cultural and religious nature, as well as a wide-ranging vocabulary borrowed from the languages of countries in which Jews lived.

In the eastern European ghetto, Yiddish achieved special status. It was regarded as the only language in which the intricacies of the Talmud and kindred literature could be properly expounded. Even today, it remains the vehicle of instruction in most Yeshivot, even in Israel. Haredim regard Hebrew as a holy tongue that must not be profaned by secular use. They prefer to use Yiddish as their vernacular.

At its highest point in the 1930s, there were around the globe 12 million Jews who spoke Yiddish. In our own time, Yiddish has more and more become a subject of scholarship, nostalgia, or a respectful reminder of the Jewish past.

Yet, a dwindling number of Yiddishists refuse to believe that Yiddish is moribund. Convinced that it embodies the best of Jewish cultural traditions and values, they assert that its survival is inseparably linked with the preservation and continuity of Jewish spiritual life.

Simcha Simchovitch, an esteemed Toronto poet, is astonishingly creative. His latest volume includes about 150 poems, with the Yiddish text and the English versions side by side.

He writes with sensitivity, compassion, and great moral fervour on a wide variety of themes: love, the Jewish past, Canada, old age, the Holocaust, nature, Israel and admired personalities.

What follows are two of his typical briefer poems – accessible, elegiac and memorable.

Hope

The little flame of hope flickers again before my eyes like a star in a pitch-black night for a faraway wanderer.

O God, do not extinguish the only quivering light in the long alien night for us – lost wanderers.

Yiddish Tongue

Wherever I go, I carry
The orphaned voices
Of those who are no more –
My Yiddish language and lore.

I sucked it with mother's milk,
I drank it like daylight with my eyes,
I hearkened to it in pious sighs
Of mothers, grandmothers.

O Yiddish language, mother tongue,
You are sweet like honey
And, like wormwood, bitter,
With you I have risen and fallen,
With you I mourn and sing,
In your pained letters I sink,
Until my heartbeat will Stand suddenly still.

The author concludes one of his poems with a tribute to those who have left "behind a treasure-trove to be discovered and admired." He could have been speaking about himself.

What's in a Moroccan name?

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Last names can often reveal fascinating hints about one's origins, and the surnames of the Jews of Morocco are no different.

The first thing one must keep in mind when studying these names is that in biblical times, there was no such thing as a surname – people simply had one first name. Usually, they were called by this name.

Perhaps only when further identification was needed, was one referred to as the "son of," as well. Hence, most common Moroccan surnames begin with "Abin," "Ibn," "Avin" and "Ben," which are all variations of the term "son of." The second rule in studying last names is that spelling is of little consequence –"Wa" or "O" also mean "son of."

As the world's population increased and identifying people by first names, and even by their father's name, became impractical, new surnames developed.

A common source for a surname was a family's geographic origin. Hence "Deri," "Ederi" and "Dray" denote families that originated in the Draa Valley. "Delmar," which literally means of or from the sea, was clearly someone who inhabited the coast. The names "Toledano" and "Elfassi" mean from Toledo and Fez respectively; and "Sarfati" denotes a Frenchman.

Then there were names that identified people by trade, such as "Assayag," which means jeweller, "Gabay," meaning religious functionary, and "Attar," which translates as herbalist.

There were also names that identified people by physical characteristics. "Azuelos" means having blue eyes, something that's not very common among Sephardim. "Moreno" means dark-skinned, a not uncommon characteristic of people whose origins are in the Mediterranean region.

Names such as "Cohen" or "Levi" could denote lineage, indicating that the person is a descendant of the kohanim (Israelite priests), or the Levites who served in the ancient Temple.

Names could also describe character: "Fehina" means wise and "Shem Tov" is of good repute. "Taib" is good, and "Kadosh" means saintly.

Some names were borne of ancient legend such as "Ben Shabat," the son of Shabat, which relates to an old Sephardi story.

Names could help reveal ethnicity, as many names are clearly of Arabic origin. Others are Berber, Spanish, Hebrew and even Phoenician. Last names such as "Gigi," "Knafo" and "Bouganim" are not Arabic at all, but rather Berber. The names "Calderon," "Soberano" and "Navaro" are Spanish. "Banon" is of Phoenician origin.

Although there have been many studies and publications about Moroccan Jewish names, the most recognized and respected research was done by the late Abraham I. Laredo in his more than 1,100-page work Les Noms Des Juifs du Maroc, published in Madrid in 1978. This publication is still the primary source and final word on the subject.

Hebrew libraries online

Sheket! Can't you see you're in a library?

Over the past two weeks, we have looked at some sites that will help you improve your Hebrew. Now that your comprehension is getting better – or if you already speak the language like a native – you have the chance to tackle some books that have been digitized and are free for the downloading. Granted, you are not going to find commercial works by Amos Oz or David Grossman here. These are older, copyright-free works. But if you do a bit of hunting, you can find works by some of the greatest names in Hebrew literature.

Start your browsing at Project Ben-Yehuda. The site aims "to make accessible the classics of Hebrew literature to the reader of Hebrew." When I took a look, there was poetry by Rachel, essays by Arlozorov and A.D. Gordon, as well as Chaim Nachman Bialik's Hebrew translation of S. Ansky's classic Yiddish play, The Dybbuk. There are thousands of other titles. [benyehuda.org/e_faq.html]

If you're looking for something a bit more contemporary, the "literature" site has modern poetry that you can enjoy for free. [literatura.co.il] Over at eSefarim, you can browse through more than 4,000 Hebrew titles before you purchase and download some onto your computer. [esfarim.co.il/]

When you walk into a Jewish bookstore or your synagogue's library, you are bound to run across many of the classics of Judaism. You can't get the same tactile experience online, but you will find many of the classics, from the Tanach and the Rambam's Mishneh Torah to the Talmud, both Babylonian and Jerusalem, at the Hebrew University's Snunit site. [kodesh.snunit.k12.il/]

But what about all the books annotating the Torah or Talmud that never became bestsellers? The aim behind HebrewBooks.org was originally "to preserve old American Hebrew books that are out of print and/or circulation." After having scanned 15,000, they have broadened their goal somewhat. "Currently, our mission has expanded to include all Torah seforim ever printed." [hebrewbooks.org/about] I came across two other sites doing similar work: SeforimOnline [seforimonline.org] and Daat. [tinyurl.com/hebdaat]

Of course, no library would be complete without a periodicals room. You may already know that you can view the Hebrew edition of H'aaretz [haaretz.co.il], Ma'ariv's NRG [nrg.co.il] and Yedioth Ahronoth's Ynet. [ynet.co.il] But here's another way to look at (a portion of) those papers and get a more realistic feel. Every day, the American site newseum.org makes available the current front page of hundreds of papers from around the world. From Israel, you can preview and print out today's front pages of Israel Hayom, the Jerusalem Post, Yedioth, Ma'ariv and Ha'aretz (Hebrew and English.) [tinyurl.com/frontpage]

Have you ever read the Hebrew papers Halevanon, Hamagid or Hazefirah? There's a good chance you haven't since most of them haven't been publishing for a century. The Jewish National and University Library has embarked on the Early Hebrew Newspapers project and is already making available more than 100,000 pages from Hebrew papers published before the establishment of the State of Israel. [tinyurl.com/earlyheb] The reading can be a bit dense, but occasionally you will happen upon a gem such as how the outbreak of World War I was reported in July 1914. Go to tinyurl.com/hebwwi and click on image seven.

The online Hebrew library never closes. Here are some more sites to keep you busy. [tinyurl.com/hebbooks]

In a previous article, I mentioned some online virtual keyboards that enable you to type in Hebrew. I received a tip from a reader about one more keyboard. Rather than trying to teach you the configuration of genuine Hebrew keyboards, Am ha-Aretz Translit makes it all so simple for English typists. When you type the letter "B," for example, a "bet" appears on the screen. Type a "G" and the "gimel" appears, and so on. With a few easy keystrokes, you are able to compose a Hebrew word or phrase. But what I find particularly useful is that the page connects directly to the Hebrew version of Google. Now you can easily type a word in Hebrew and do a Google search on it. [amhaaretz.org/translit]

Lone soldier's house memorializes family's son

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On July 20, 2006, Israel Defence Forces' soldier Benji Hillman was killed in action at the start of the Second Lebanon War.

He died at age 27 in the Lebanese village of Moran Aras.

A company commander in the Egoz unit, Hillman was revered by the soldiers under his command for his caring-but-tough style and his loyalty to the unit.

He was killed just three weeks after marrying his wife, Ayala, leaving her and his close-knit family to grieve for what could have been.

Out of the grief was born the Benji Hillman Foundation, founded in August 2006 by the Hillman family to "continue Benji's legacy of caring for his fellow soldiers by building Ha'bayit shel Benji (Benji's House) in his hometown of Ra'anana.

The house is intended to provide specific care and support for lone soldiers – youths 18 to 30 who leave their families abroad to come to Israel and serve in the army and often find the move overwhelming – and for soldiers who come from dysfunctional or underprivileged families.

Once built, the house will employ a permanent "house mother" and a staff of volunteers to tend to the needs of the soldiers who pass through and to maintain the facilities.

It will provide accommodation for up to 50 soldiers and offer educational and vocational guidance for all of its residents both during and post-army service.

According to Ofer Einav, who served under Hillman and who later became a commander himself, Hillman was able to empathize with lone soldiers because of his background.

"There's a culture shock [for lone soldiers], and Benji felt close to some of those soldiers who came from outside," Einav said. "He was always concerned that all under his command were treated well."

Benji Hillman was killed in action at the beginning of the Second Lebanon War.

The Hillmans made aliyah to Ra'anana from London, England, in 1983 when Benji was four.

Einav explained that for many lone soldiers, time spent on furlough can be excruciatingly lonely and disorienting. And once their service is up, they often don't know how to adapt to Israeli cultural mores, forcing many to leave when they could be considering aliyah.

"The Bayit shel Benji will help them get their own room, bed, laundry service and introduce them to friends who share a commonality as lone soldiers," Einav said.

Einav spoke to The Canadian Jewish News last month while in Toronto visiting family and trying to raise awareness about Ha'bayit shel Benji with North Americans.

"Benji was an amazing person," Einav recalled. "He always looked you straight in the eye. He knew when to be tough, when to be kind and how to motivate."

Einav said he remembered how Hillman would always make time to share a moment with him, even when he was being summoned to speak with his superiors.

"He'd stop and say, 'Come back to my tent and we'll have a Coke.' And I would tell him, 'But you're supposed to go speak with your [superiors].' He'd tell me they could wait. He was like that... always a father figure to his men," Einav said.

Einav's uncle in Toronto, Jeff Kerbel, is helping to handle the fundraising in North America for the house.

According to Kerbel, the project has thus far raised more than $2 million from private donations in the United Kingdom, Israel and the United States but none from Canada.

The total cost is estimated at $3 million.

Hillman also had a special affinity for Toronto, having been sent here on occasion as an IDF emissary to speak with Jewish youth about Israel, Kerbel said.

Land for the house has already been set aside by the municipality of Ra'anana, and a groundbreaking ceremony is slated for this winter.

For more information, visit www.benjihillman.org or call Jeff Kerbel at 416-777-5772.

Israeli water expert offers to help with algae problem

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli water expert Elion Adar admits he feels a little like a mouse standing before a mammoth when he presumes to offer help to Canada in the management of its seemingly limitless supply of the wet stuff.

After all, Israel has but one freshwater body – Lake Kinneret – while Canada has 20 per cent of the world's total freshwater.

Nevertheless, Adar believes Canada can benefit from what Israel has learned from necessity over many years: how to keep the water it has pristine, and squeeze every drop, so to speak, out of it.

"Israel is the first country in the world to recognize that water is a scarce commodity, like oil," he said. Canada may have an immense quantity of water, but its quality is deteriorating quickly, he warned.

Adar, director of the Zuckerberg Institute for Water Research at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, came to Montreal to meet with Line Beauchamp, Quebec minister of sustainable development, the environment and parks. He thinks he and his fellow scientists at BGU may be able to contribute to the reduction of blue-green algae that is contaminating some 70 of the province's lakes.

Last year, Quebec launched a 10-year, $200-million action plan to clean up the toxic growth.

He also hopes to foster academic exchanges with water experts at McGill University, the Université de Montréal and the Université du Québec, both in Montreal and Trois-Rivières.

Adar, and the Canadian Associates of BGU, which hosted his recent Montreal visit, want to develop with Quebec a similar relationship that now exists between Israel and Manitoba.

Adar had just come from the first-ever Manitoba-Israel water symposium, hosted by the province's water stewardship minister Christine Melnick, in co-operation with the Jewish National Fund. Adar was one of 12 Israeli water experts who met in Winnipeg with an equal number of their Manitoba counterparts for three days to share their knowledge on issues of common concern.

Adar is a world renowned scholar in the field of water management, specifically, in assessing how ground water flows into lakes and rivers. He is the developer of the Mixing Cell Model, that has revitalized waterways in Israel, as well as countries as diverse as Namibia, Mongolia and Kazakhstan.

Blue-green algae thrive on the overabundance of phosphates and nitrates, mainly from fertilizers and detergents, running off into bodies of water. Only if scientists have a better understanding of how these and other pollutants move above and below ground, can a means be found to stop their spread into lakes and rivers, he said.

But, he added, the cause of this algae is likely not only man-made. The natural decomposition of plants and minerals may also be contributing factors.

If scientists have a better understanding of how these and other pollutants move above and below the ground, they could stop their spread into lakes and rivers, he said.

The Manitoba symposium was the first time top scientists from any country were invited by the province to discuss water, which Adar takes as a huge compliment, given the fact that Lake Winnipeg is bigger than all of Israel.

Blue-green algae is a problem in Manitoba, too, and one of the issues examined was innovative techniques to remove the nutrients that feed these bacteria-laden growths from wastewater.

The Manitoba government has also launched a water stewardship scholarship program, in partnership with JNF, to encourage graduate-level students from the province to pursue water-related studies at post-secondary institutions in Israel. The program allows one student per year over the next 10 years to study in Israel.

Manitoba has also allocated $300,000 for scientific collaboration between the University of Manitoba and BGU on water management.

A thunderstorm was raging while Adar addressed a small gathering at the home of Associates' Montreal chair Gerry Feifer and his wife Sherry. Adar was envious; Israel has had four consecutive dry years which is straining its ability to supply water to Israelis and, to a certain extent, its Jordanian and Palestinian neighbours.

The Kinneret, the national water reservoir, provides less than a quarter of water needs, is healthy today and the water is safe to drink out of any tap in the country, he said, because it has been watched carefully for 45 years. But it supplies less than a quarter of Israel's water needs.

Israel is now desalinating 156 million cubic meters of water annually, Adar said, and that requires 4KW of electricity for every cubic meter.

Since the national water distribution system was put in place in 1964, the population has more than doubled and agricultural output is 3.5 times higher, yet the amount of water consumed is about the same, he said.

Sokolsky addresses situation in Georgia

"While we're here this evening, another 16 Jews landed in Ben-Gurion [Airport]," he said. "As of tonight, because of your support, no Jew in Georgia goes without food and shelter. All have been accounted for and are safe. This is because of the work you have done [as donors] to provide the funds for this infrastructure."

Sokolsky then introduced Kristol, the evening's keynote speaker.

Kristol, a native New Yorker and editor of the Weekly Standard, said he has "many friends" in Toronto and thanked its Jewish community for being "strong" before proceeding to discuss his life as a Republican supporter and strategist, saying he was relieved to be in Canada where he doesn't have to worry about talking partisan politics.

"When I'm in the U.S., I have to make the case for Republicans to Jews… which is a hopeless case," he said to light laughter.

He then regaled the audience with anecdotes about conversations with prominent U.S. politicians and made detailed observations about the ongoing presidential election race, sharing his views on the chances of Barack Obama and John McCain.

Kristol said he believes Obama "should" beat McCain based on his popular support, but that the Republican hopeful still has a chance to beat Obama if he appeals to the American public's fear of unchecked power by the Democrats. He noted that the U.S. Congress is controlled by the Democrats and will be for at least two years.

He also conveyed the thanks of "the American public," whom he said are grateful that Canadian soldiers are "fighting alongside Americans in Afghanistan" and are "fighting aggressively and well."

He added: "There's a genuine respect for the Canadian military [in the United States]."

Kristol's speech made only brief allusion to the local Jewish community.

"The Toronto community does great things. I salute you for what you've done," he said toward the end of his talk, singling out what he called "the revitalization of Jewish youth here."

Mauda capped off the night with an encore performance and a moving rendition of Hatikvah.

In its Campaign 2009 literature, the federation outlined some of its upcoming priorities and projects.

They include Project 25/35, "an incubator for social entrepreneurs in the 25-35 age range"; the Jewish Camp Incentive Program, formerly known as Campright, which provides grants to "qualifying" campers in grades 2 through 7; dedicating more resources to Jewish campus life in Ontario, as well as to helping Jewish seniors and the community's indigent; and developing "specialized, culture-specific integration programs for Israeli and Russian [newcomers] to ease their transition" to Canada.

Federation said it will also continue to "stand with the people of Israel" by allocating more resources through UIA Federations Canada to vocational and social welfare programs in Israel, with specific emphasis on Bat Yam's Ethiopian community and the communities of Sderot and the upper Galilee.

According to federation figures, the funding allotment for programs in 2008-09, totalled more than $60.3 million, with the two largest items – "Israel/overseas projects" and "formal Jewish education" – accounting for more than half the budget, $17,662,000 and $14,308,000, respectively.

Other expenditures included $5,175,536 for "assisting the vulnerable," $5,052,000 for administration, $4,817,000 for "other" community allocations, such as "pre-development costs for the campuses that we are building, allocations to a variety of programs and agencies from Jewish Foundation proceeds (this is the money generated by endowment funds that are not designated by the donor for specific purposes), donor designated allocations, other miscellaneous programs [and a] contingency reserve fund," a federation spokesperson said.

Federation also allocated $3,895,000 for identity development among youth and young adults, $1,820,769 for newcomer integration, $1,413,701 for culture, $720,000 for community security and $554,359 for seniors.

A HOLE IN ONE: Proceeds from the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation's 18th annual golf tournament, On the Green, held at Copper Creek Golf Club, will go toward the construction of the new Wilf Children's Hospital at Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem. The golf committee was led by Melanie Malach and Joel Solish, and lead sponsor was Wells Fargo Foothill Canada. This year On the Green raised more than $50,000. CJPAC relaunches fellowship program

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

CJPAC is preparing to expose a new group of politically minded Jewish students to the Canadian political system through it's annual fellowship program.

Now in it's third year, The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's (CJPAC) Fellowship Program offers both graduate and undergraduate students across the country the opportunity to strengthen their political skills and engage with some of the major players in Canadian politics.

Josh Cooper

Throughout the school year, participants will take part in a political training program specializing in political campaigning, advocacy, strategy, and communication to be better equipped to advocate for the Jewish community and Israel.

"Our goal is always to engage the community in the political process on behalf of our issues," said Josh Cooper, executive director of CJPAC.

"In the fellows program, we are looking to have people who are trained at the highest possible level when they do engage in the democratic area. We are a multi-partisan organization, so the goal is to be able to put forth the best trained people to engage in the political system."

He said that in just three years, CJPAC fellows have gained a positive reputation through their interactions with politicians at conferences and events, and are sought after by political offices once they graduate.

Cooper said that the program was so successful that when the first group of 21 fellows completed the program, some asked organizers if they could apply again.

The following year, 12 students were accepted as "senior fellows," who acted as mentors for the 24 first-time fellows.

"The main thing we looked for was, 'What did you accomplish outside of the standard program in the past school year?'" Cooper said, adding that senior fellows had to reapply to be accepted back into the program and were only accepted if they fit the criteria.

"Some of them may have gotten involved in a local riding association, some of them may have run for student office on campus, some of them may have been running for a position in either municipal, provincial or federal politics."

Cooper said that some students opt to take part in the program twice, because each year offers unique experiences.

"Every year, we're always engaging with different political figures and every year, there are different things that are happening in the spectrum," he said.

"The first year we did the program, we had the Liberal leadership race… Last year, the federal political scene was somewhat quieter, and this coming year, we're either going to have, during the school year, at least three political conventions for federal parties, or you're going to have an election, or you could end up with both."

Cooper said that those who apply have to able to commit to a four-day training conference that will be held in Ottawa in November as well as other scheduled programming.

"Every three weeks we have a conference call with a guest speaker and it could be the leader of a community organization, it could be a key political figure, it could be anything to do with the community or politics… In addition, we also expect them to engage on campus as well," he said.

At the conference in Ottawa, Cooper said, students can expect to meet with party leaders, senior strategists and candidates.

"Last year, one person who went over well was a young MNA, a provincial member from Quebec who is the youngest elected official in the country," he said, referring to 22-year-old member of the national assembly Simon-Pierre Diamond.

"He was younger than some of the fellows. Here was someone they could really relate to and they went from meeting with him to meeting with Minister [of Public Safety Stockwell] Day and then after that, they met with the [national] director of the Liberal party, Greg Fergus."

He added that in addition to being able to meet and speak with elected officials, the students also get the opportunity to meet with those behind the scenes.

"We also get a lot of the backroom guys who aren't normally guest speakers at venues, but in this type of situation, they are celebrities, they are the guys our fellows want to learn from."

And judging by the success stories of some of the fellows, they do learn from the people they meet.

"We had one fellow from the first year who ran as a city councillor… The program has been tremendously successful in the sense that many have gone back into the political system upon graduating… Well over half of our first year fellows are now working somewhere in a political office somewhere in the country," he said.

Copper said he encourages any student who is fascinated by politics to apply.

"Basically, if you love politics, you'll love the fellows program. If politics isn't your thing, neither is this."

Applications are currently being accepted. For more information or to apply, please visit www.cjpac.ca/page/campus or contact Gabe Garfinkel at ggarfinkel@cjpac.ca.

Hundreds gather to pay respects to founder of Camp Walden

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For his family, friends, past and present Camp Walden campers, the day Ted Cole lost his long battle with leukemia was the day the music died.

On Aug. 19, Cole, 67, best remembered as the folk music-loving Camp Walden founder and director, succumbed to his illness and slipped into unconsciousness while surrounded by his loving family.

The funeral was held at Holy Blossom Temple on Aug. 21, where hundreds of people – many of whom were former Walden campers – squeezed into the sanctuary, overflowed into the balcony, and sat in silence for 10 minutes in anticipation of the start of the service.

Cole is survived by his wife, Elaine, his sons, Cory and Ryan, and their families.

Cole was 29 when he founded the camp outside of Bancroft, Ont., and shortly thereafter he met his wife who became both his partner in life and in work for 35 years.

According to a statement posted on the Camp Walden website, his "grassroots, no-nonsense approach combined with a provocative sense of humour and wit touched the lives of tens of thousands of campers, staff, and their families."

Cole incorporated his love of music into the camp experience by leading annual singsongs that all generations of Walden campers enjoyed.

"Ted's passion for folk music was one of the cornerstones of his camp direction. Since his days in high school, Ted worked to hone his skills as a singer, songwriter and instrumentalist… The songs that Ted loved and shared often contained messages of peace and individual courage," the statement continued.

Phil Epstein spoke at the service about his lifelong friend of 50 years, who he met, fittingly, when they were both 16-year-old campers at Camp Tamarack in Alberta.

"Ted had two loves: One was camping and everything to do with camping," Epstein said.

"As always, Ted was the consummate director, mentor, teacher and surrogate parent. He and Elaine made [Walden] feel like a second home for so many of you."

In addition to his work with Camp Walden, Cole was instrumental in founding many other camp programs, including Madawaska Camps and the Scarborough/Toronto Arts Camp Programs.

He also helped establish a charity called Kids In Camp, which is devoted to providing financial assistance to families who want to send their children to camp.

Cole was accomplished in his field, but to his son Cory, who spoke on behalf of his family, Cole was just as dedicated and devoted to Walden as he was to his wife and sons.

"Whether a life companion, family, friend, role model, mentor, inspiration – whatever you needed Dad to be, he was," he said. "He offered his soul to anyone who came by it honestly."

He added that his father was an "infinite dreamer. He inspired all those who walked in his wake to dream a little harder, to search a little longer, to fight a little stronger. This was his infectious gift, his poetic vision that the world we live in is the one we create."

And according to those who spoke about Cole at the service, the world that he created was filled with love.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, who presided over the service with Rabbi Yael Splansky, said that before Cole lapsed into unconsciousness last week, "Ted's family had piled their hands on top of his. Ted opened his eyes and said, 'I feel I'm surrounded by a wall of love. Now I'm ready to go.' And he closed his eyes…

"If only Ted could serenade us right now, I know his song would contain the words of consolation you need to hear. They would be words of strength and candour and empathy and wry humour. It would be Ted," the rabbi said.

"Ted had been my closest friend for 50 years," Epstein said.

"The Ted I knew would not want us to grieve, but remember him as he was – vibrant, caring, irreverent, funny, committed and above all, loved."

He added, in reference to Cole's passion for music, that there is a theological question rabbis have debated for centuries.

"Is there is music in heaven? There is now."

An invigorating hike in Israel's Judean Desert

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

EIN GEDI, Israel — There it was, looming like a mirage in a desert.

I could hardly believe my eyes. A hidden waterfall tucked into a crevice deep in an imposing limestone canyon.

On a sizzling day, when the temperature reached 40 degrees celsius, I found myself in one of Israel's most stunning nature reserves, the Ein Gedi National Park, which covers 3,587 acres on the eastern edge of the Judean Desert and which is adjacent to the Dead Sea.

Two valleys run through the park, Wadi David in the north and Wadi Arugot in the south, and both attract hikers the year round.

The hike through Wadi David is relatively easy, but the hike into Wadi Arugot is considerably harder. You should only attempt these hikes if you're physically fit.

I reached the park at around 8 a.m., having spent the previous night at a hotel on the shore of the Dead Sea. There, at the all-inclusive Golden Tulip Hotel, situated at the Ein Bokek complex of hotels, I took a dip in the Dead Sea – the lowest body of water on earth at 420 metres below sea level– and treated myself to a 30-minute Swedish massage administered by a Russian masseuse.

My guide, Noam Savion, accompanied me to the reserve, which is fed by four sweet-water springs. Starting out on the hike, we passed several ibexes, which live in herds and are famed for their ability to climb steeps hills, and a lone rock hyrax, which resembles a beaver. These are but two of the protected mammals that inhabit the Judean Desert. There are also red foxes, striped hyenas, gazelles and leopards, which are nocturnal and rarely seen.

Wadi Arugot's rugged landscape [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

Walking past a stream sheltered by thickets of aromatic reeds, we reached the base of a pool fed by a modest waterfall named after King David. During the summer months, the waterfall is reduced to little more than a glorified trickle.

As we ascended the escarpment, passing the odd acacia tree and Jericho balsam thorn struggling to survive in this generally harsh climate, the Dead Sea, the Moab mountains and Kibbutz Ein Gedi came into view.

By the time we hit the trail that leads to Wadi Arugot, which is also known as Nahal Arugot, an hour or so had elapsed. We each drank plenty of water to keep hydration at bay.

The unspoiled landscape was awesome, a desiccated panorama of tan limestone cliffs broken by narrow valleys dense with vegetation.

On this day, probably due to the heat, Nahal Arugot was virtually bereft of hikers. For all intents and purposes, we had it all to ourselves as we followed a marked foot path.

We went through a canopy of reeds in the shape of a tunnel, pausing for a refreshing drink of bottled water before walking up a series of winding paths close to the precipice.

The day was bright and clear, with nary a cloud in the sky.

The occasional bird flew by. Many types of birds are found in Nahal Arugot, including fan-tailed ravens, Egyptian vultures, sand patridges, red-breasted wagtails, Arabian babblers and white-crowned black wheatears.

After an hour, we descended deeper into the defile, slogging through a muddy creek partially shielded from the glare of the sun by shrubs, willows and tamarisks.

Then, lo and behold, I saw it. The pool and the waterfall.

In this merciless, bone-dry environment, it seemed like an apparition.

I changed into my swimming trunks and waded into the natural pool, carefully slipping past slippery algae-encrusted stones and pebbles.

I crouched on the shallow bottom, savouring the cool water and feeling lucky and euphoric. As I approached the raging torrent, the water reached my waist.

Positioning myself directly under the waterfall, I felt rapid hard bursts of water massaging my shoulders. I stood there for a few blissful minutes, oblivious to everything else.

Jews settled in Ein Gedi oasis in seventh century

This was nirvana.

Noam had already made sage tea when I emerged from the pool. As we relaxed, sipping the brew from small glasses, our backs against the escarpment, a pair of hikers suddenly appeared. They, too, waded into the pool for a dip.

Re-invigorated, we hiked back to the starting point at Ein Gedi, with Noam leading the way. As I admired the rugged terrain, soaking up the solitude, I reflected on Ein Gedi's place in Jewish history as a refuge.

Kibbutz Ein Gedi's gardens

Judging by archeological excavations, Jews settled in the Ein Gedi oasis in the seventh century BCE. Destroyed by the Babylonians during the First Temple period, Ein Gedi was resurrected during the Hellenistic era. Revitalized during the Hasmonean period (152-37 BCE), it flourished as an agricultural colony. Subsequently, Ein Gedi's fortunes waxed and waned. From the 13th century onward, it was variously inhabited by Jews and Bedouins.

Kibbutz Ein Gedi – a short drive from Massada, the fortress that was besieged and conquered by a Roman army – was founded in 1956. Today, the kibbutz lives off tourism, agriculture and a bottling plant.

Beautifully landscaped as a botanical garden, its lawns and residential cottages are set off by 800 species of trees, shrubs and flowers from around the world. Wandering around the grounds, I came upon tropical trees and plants from South American rainforests and local plants transplanted from the surrounding desert.

Regrettably, the Cactus Park, whose collection of desert plants is probably unrivalled in Israel, was closed.

Toward the close of the afternoon, Noam and I met up with Gil Shkedi, the owner of Desert Tracks, a company that offers guided jeep tours of the virtually uninhabited region at the southern end of the Dead Sea.

Shkedi, a resident of a moshav called Neot Hakikar, drove into several wadis hemmed in by blindingly white rock salt formations and soft limestone cliffs. He also took us up to Mt. Sodom, which, at about 100 metres below sea level, is supposedly the lowest mountain on the planet.

From Mt. Sodom, the view was spectacular. Through the haze, I saw the salt pans of the Dead Sea, the brooding Moab mountain range, a potash plant, patches of green denoting farms and the Jordanian town of Safi.

It had been a great day.

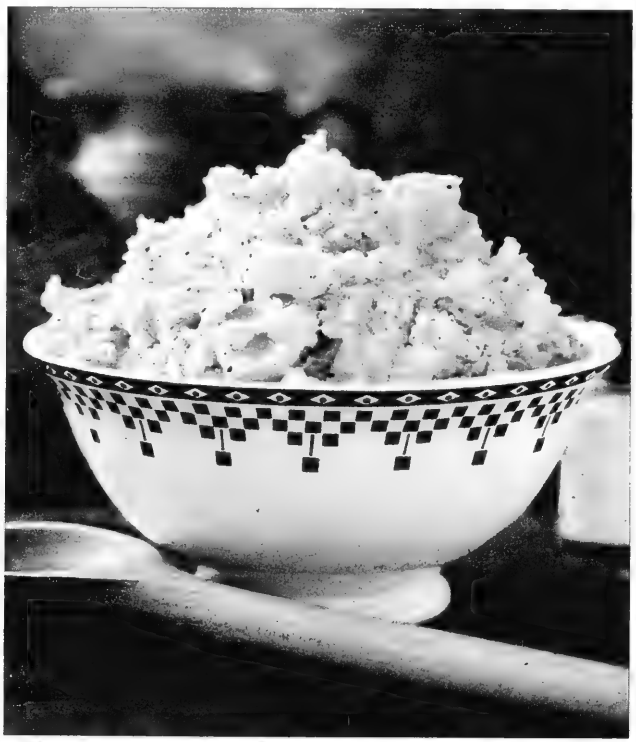
Potato salad and summer go together

BY RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Summer is officially potato salad season. Although there's only a few weeks left, there is still time to leave the kugels, and try these variations on the traditional mayonnaise-laden combo (although there's nothing wrong with that!) Let's travel from Vienna to Israel for low-carb ideas.



VIENNESE POTATO SALAD

This is how my mother-in-law makes her potato salad. The slightly sweet, slightly tangy dressing is a winner. It's best served at room temperature, although it gets better over the course of a few days in the refrigerator. It's prettiest when served in a glass bowl.

2½ lb. red potatoes
½ medium onion, finely chopped
½ cup cider vinegar
¼ cup water
1 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. brown mustard seeds (optional)
1 tsp. mustard
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley
1 tsp. paprika
salt and pepper to taste.
2 eggs, hardboiled
¼ cup sliced green onions (optional)

Bring potatoes to a boil and cook until fork-tender, 25 to 35 minutes. Drain the potatoes in a colander and peel while they are as hot as you can handle. Slice thinly and place in a large bowl. Combine remaining ingredients except for eggs and pour over potatoes. Slice eggs thinly and arrange on top of potatoes around perimeter of bowl. Scatter green onions, if you wish. Cover tightly with plastic wrap and refrigerate at least overnight.

ISRAELI POTATO SALAD

Israelis make no bones about what the chief ingredient in this salad is. It's its official name is "mayonnaise salad." You will find it at every wedding or bar mitzvah among the array of salads usually offered. You may substitute light mayonnaise to make it less calorie-laden.

6 medium potatoes
4 eggs
salt to taste
½ cup (or more) mayonnaise
1 can peas and cubed carrots

Place potatoes in large saucepan; add water to cover. Bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat and simmer, uncovered, 20 to 30 minutes or until potatoes are fork-tender. Drain and let cool. At the same time, cook eggs in a separate saucepan. Peel potatoes and eggs and cut into ¼-inch pieces.

Drain peas and carrots well and combine with potatoes and eggs. Add mayonnaise and salt to taste.

Chill before serving; sprinkle with green onions (optional).

MOCK POTATO SALAD

For those on low-carb diets, here is a cruciferous-conscious potato salad-wannabe that is sure to please.

6 medium kohlrabi, peeled, diced
2 medium celery stalks, diced
½ medium red onion, diced
½ cup mayonnaise
3 tbsp. finely chopped flat-leafed parsley
2 tbsp. mustard
1 tbsp. cider vinegar
1 tbsp. honey

Combine all ingredients. Chill for at least a few hours. Garnish with paprika, if desired, or chopped dill.

אובאמה והפתק

חיכיתי מספר שבועות לפני שאזרתי כוח להתגבר על גועל הנפש ולכתוב את הקטע הבא. לאלה שלא שמעו, או שהספיקו לשכוח: ברק אובאמה מבקר בישראל וכדרך כל המנהיגים עולה לכותל ומטמין פתק בין האבנים. תלמיד ישיבה מוציא את הפתק מהקיר ומוכר אותו לעיתון "מעריב" שמפרסמו בעמוד מרכזי. בעקבות ההלם והגועל- מגנה רב הכותל את המעשה, מבקש את סליחת אובאמה ומבטיח לו שלמרות הכל- תפילתו הגיעה השמימה. ושיא הגועל והקבס: עיתון מעריב מבהיר שמאחר ואובאמה אינו יהודי- הוצאת הפתק מן הכותל איננה מהווה פגיעה בצנעת הפרט!! הפרשה גרמה לי כעס, בושה, ואחר כך -הרהורים עגומים על התוויה הישראלית.

תלמיד ישיבה-העלית שבעלית, כל חייו אמורים להיות מוקדשים - לעשות טוב ובאמונה. לא רק שהוא מחלל את החוקים הכי עמוקים של היהדות-הוא מוכר את הפתק בכסף מלא.

הרב שניסה לצאת מפרשה מביכה והודיע לאובאמה שתפילתו התקבלה..... אתם מבינים-בירושלים שיחה עם הקב"ה היא חיזו מקומי, הרב דיבר עם המשרד של אל עליון ושם הודיעו לו שתפילתו של אובאמה התקבלה.....

וסמרטיתון מעריב, שפעם התניימר להיות העיתון הנפוץ במדינה- מצדיק את המעשה הזה. מה? המילה "סליחה" קשה מידי עבורם? העיתון הזה כבר מזמן אינו נמכר כאן, והמעשה הזה מוכיח מדוע חשוב מאוד שהוא ייסגר-ויפוהשעה אחת קודם.

ושישאר בינינו.

There's oil in them hills...extra virgin olive oil

Production process yields no waste

By ROSIE SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

How often do you head for the hills and say that you're not going home? Idyllic vacations may lead to such fantasies, but not many of us actually pack up our bags and start a new life elsewhere. Still, that's exactly what Avner Talmon decided to do while horseback riding in the Galilee a decade ago.

Talmon traded in running a plastics company in Tel Aviv to grow olives and produce olive oil in the Golan. Together with his wife, Smadar, the Israel Defence Forces reservist, who was a colonel and ex-paratrooper, runs the company Golan Olive Oil and Visitors Center in Katzrin, right across the road from the Golan Heights Winery.

Because of Avner Talmon's love and deep respect for the countryside, his desire to use environmentally friendly production methods became the foundation for the design of the facility. Preserving the ancient, lush, fertile lands is paramount to him. He points out that the olives are grown in the same general area where Jewish warriors defended the land against the Romans.

Eleven different varieties of olives are used to make three different types of extra virgin olive oil – the only kind of oil the Talmons produce. The types vary according to colour, taste and fruitiness. For example, the Tabha line offers a more delicate and lighter-tasting oil, while the Beith Saida is fruitier with a more pronounced aroma.

Extra virgin olive oil – a term that is regulated by the International Olive Oil Council – is unrefined and contains the lowest level of acidity along with a host of phytochemicals, disease-fighting compounds from plant foods. For the oil to be classified as extra virgin, only top quality olives that yield a pleasing aroma, taste and colour can be used.

While the Golan operation is situated in the same place as ancient olive mills were located 3,000 years ago, the equipment used now is state-of-the art. Not only is it superior in producing top quality oil but for Talmon, the issue of sanitation is also critical. To him, the old technology of crushing and extracting using a stone press is no longer acceptable to the modern, inspected markets.

What is unique about Golan Olive Oil is that the oil production yields no waste. Instead, the residual olive matter is turned into cosmetic products. The company's labs have developed the Olea Essence series: a collection of natural ingredient cosmetic products containing no preservatives, artificial colours or perfumes. Moisturizers, night cream, eye cream, hand and body lotion are just a few of the offerings.

You can try them out while at the visitors' centre. But there's much more to the site than soothing your skin. Talmon, whose undergraduate degree is in archeology, had the building designed with the ancient architecture of the region in mind. Guided tours are conducted and include explanations about olive oil production, from the earliest tools used to the company's modern machinery. A short fun film about Golan Olive Oil is part of the tour. And of course, tasting the olive oils is included, and it's a wonderful way to end the tour. But if you like, you can head to Cafe Olea for some light eats or to the shop for some olive oil or cosmetics.

For more information, contact Golan Olive Oil at P.O. Box 3619, Kazrin 12900 Israel. Phone: 972 4 6850023; e-mail: info@golanoliveoil.com

Here's a flavourful salad from Israel from my book, The Enlightened Eater's Whole Foods Guide (Viking Canada). You can also serve it as a bed for grilled fish. Za'atar, a blend of dried hyssop, sumac and sesame seeds, is available at Middle Eastern grocers – together with a good quality olive oil, it's a wonderful topping for flatbreads and pitas.

NUTTY FATTOUCH SALAD

3 cups coarsely chopped fresh assorted herbs (parsley, chives, cilantro, dill, mint)
1 large tomato, diced
1 red pepper, diced
2 tbsp. coarsely chopped assorted nuts, toasted (walnuts, pecans, pine nuts, etc.)
1 tbsp. za'atar
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
salt and freshly ground pepper
2 or 3 small pitas, toasted, cooled and broken into large pieces

In a large bowl, toss together chopped herbs, tomato, red pepper, nuts and za'atar; drizzle on oil and lemon juice and toss. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Place a pita on each plate and ladle salad mixture over the pitas. Alternatively, the pitas can be broken up and tossed in with the vegetables and herbs. Serves 4.

Distinguished architect turns 100

'It's his discipline, among which is whisky, but not before 6 p.m.'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Samuel Norton (Sonny) Tomkin, one of South Africa's most distinguished architects, celebrates his 100th birthday today.

Tomkin was interviewed by The Canadian Jewish News at his residence in the Don Mills Road and Lawrence Avenue area in Toronto, where he lives with his daughter and son-in-law.

Behind him, on the wall of his living room, are framed certificates and awards for his architectural accomplishments and his services to the city of Durban government.

His daughter Janet Hellmann, a psychotherapist, joked about her father's longevity. "It is his discipline," she says. "Among which is his whisky, but not before 6 p.m." She adds, "But my father doesn't take any medications."

Tomkin's parents emigrated to England before the turn of the century, leaving Minsk, then under Russian rule, to escape pogroms. Tomkin was born in London in 1908. When Tomkin was six, his father went to South Africa to buy cattle for export to England.

To escape the bombings in London during World War I, his mother took Tomkin and her two daughters to Worthing, a holiday resort area.

There were no Jewish people in Worthing, he says, and he didn't have the opportunity to learn Hebrew there.

"One day, when I was six years old, my teacher asked me to go outside and shake out the chalk dust cloth and I saw the first Zeppelin."

In 1919, his mother and the three children journeyed to South Africa on a boat that carried mail, the only way to travel between England and South Africa in those days, to join Tomkin's father, who had established a successful business.

"I practically had no education until I got to Pretoria," he says. "Being surrounded by females for some time, my father wanted me to go to a boys' boarding school, but boarding schools would not accept Jews."

In the government schools, "anti-Semitism was alive and well, and I was being knocked about. My father taught me to box, and after my first encounter, nobody hassled me again," Tomkin remembers.

Samuel Norton (Sonny) Tomkin

At 13, he was sent to a Catholic boarding school. It took him two days and a night of travelling to get there from home, and he went home only twice a year. After high school, he wanted to continue his education.

He didn't knowing what career path to follow, but his life took shape when he attended Witwatersrand University in Johannesburg. There he met Nathan Finkelstein, who was going into the architecture program, and Tomkin also decided to study architecture.

"There were five of us in the class, and after five years, I received what today is a master's of architecture. With Nathan and another former architectural student, we opened a practice in Johannesburg," Tomkin says.

"Architects weren't used much in those days, and when my partner Nathan died, I realized that there wasn't enough work for the practice, so I moved to Durban, where my sister had a summer place. I opened my own practice in her home."

The Durban Jewish Club was the only country club in the city that accepted Jews. It was at the club that he joined an amateur theatre group, through which he met and later married Rita Barnard. He became an avid polo player, winning eight championships in competition.

Tomkin's career flourished as he moved from designing homes to working on large contracts for universities, hospitals, government and synagogues, including Durban's Great Synagogue.

Along with his successful career, Tomkin distinguished himself as a volunteer for his work as an honorary consultant to the city of Durban.

Tragedy struck his family when his son, Neil, was wounded in a random shooting at the age of 21. Neil's girlfriend was killed. Neil, who is disabled, still lives in Durban with his wife.

Tomkin's daughter, Janet, and her husband, Jonathan Hellmann, a pediatric/neonatal doctor at the Hospital for Sick Children, moved to Toronto 26 years ago.

Tomkin and his wife visited Toronto frequently, but he wasn't sure that he wanted to make the city his home. His wife, Rita, convinced him to move to Toronto 16 years ago. She died 10 years ago.

To commemorate Tomkin's 100th birthday, a gathering of family and friends will take place today at his home.

Tomkin does have one regret about moving to Canada "I lost my identity because I was always professionally geared. My identity was suddenly cut loose," he says.

Despite the challenges Tomkin faced when he left his life in South Africa, he expressed much appreciation for Canada and all that it has offered him.

Israel and PA far from peace accord

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The visit of U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Israel this week will seek to determine whether it will be possible to present an Israeli-Palestinian accord to the world, or even a partial document of agreement, before the end of the current year.

Analysis

Nine months have passed since the Annapolis, Md., conference, which was held at the behest of Rice and at which the participants promised to "make every effort" to reach a settlement by the end of 2008. Any attempt to redeem that promise will take place in the shadow of a political crisis in Israel.

Is a settlement possible? There are serious disagreements in the Israeli leadership over the answer to this. Before bridging the differences between Israelis and Palestinians, Rice will have to pave the way between the contradictory viewpoints of her hosts in Jerusalem.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert believes that it is possible and necessary to reach a "shelf agreement" now – a deal whose implementation will be spread over a decade. The agreement would determine the boundaries of a future Palestinian state, security arrangements and resolve the refugee question. Olmert believes that the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, also would like to reach such an agreement and so do the Americans.

The Bush administration is eager to have some diplomatic achievement before the end of a disappointing tenure. The candidates who hope to succeed him, John McCain and Barack Obama, have told Olmert that they would be glad if Bush would lift the burden of negotiating the Israeli-Palestinian peace from their shoulders.

Condoleezza Rice

Olmert faces opposition from both Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. In their view, Israel must not rush. Livni believes that detailed negotiations must continue on all issues and that Israel should avoid an unclear agreement. She also supports deferring resolution of the Jerusalem quagmire. Barak has warned against dangerous illusions, at a time when the gap between the two sides remain substantial.

The respective political interests of all those involved is obvious. Olmert is due to step down and wants to end his shortened tenure with a diplomatic achievement. Livni and Barak, who will soon face voters in elections, would prefer to wait for him to go. The prime minister rejects their criticism. His aides say that he is not rushing, and will not relinquish any essential Israeli interests for the sake of a mere document. The principles of the agreement are clear, the aides say – all those involved in it favour the agreement, and it would be a shame to miss this opportunity because of domestic political differences.

On one issue, all three agree: they reject the idea put forth by Rice, to publish a document of partial agreements detailing the positions of each side on different issues. In their view, such a document would only harm Israel and would serve as a basis for pressure in the future. Following a meeting in Washington with Rice and Abbas in late July, Livni is of the opinion that the idea will be dropped.

However, Rice is keen on showing gains, especially in light of the growing criticism directed against her in the United States. This week, Washington Post columnist Jim Hoagland wrote that the secretary of state had been "ineffective, petulant and overly tactical" in responding to the crisis in the Caucasus. Hoagland lay responsibility on Rice for the failed Russia policy of the Bush administration and wrote that Secretary of Defence Robert Gates dealt with the crisis in Georgia directly vis-a-vis his counterparts in Moscow, whereas the Russian foreign minister screened the calls from Rice. Thus, wounded and eager for some sort of positive legacy, Rice arrived on another frustrating mission in Jerusalem and Ramallah this week.

Democratic VP candidate strong on pro-Israel legislation

By RON KAMPEAS and ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

DENVER— Before he announced his vice-presidential choice, Barack Obama said he wanted someone to spar with, but who ultimately would be loyal enough to create a comfortable working relationship.

Analysis

No one knew then that Obama had picked his U.S. Senate colleague Joe Biden, 65, but the Democratic presidential candidate's requirement fit Biden's relationship with the Jewish community to a T.

On Saturday, two days before the start of the Democratic National Convention here, Obama chose Biden to be the No. 2 man on the party's ticket.

The loquacious Biden, a senator since 1973, has sparred frequently with the pro-Israel community and with Israelis, particularly on the issue of settlements. But he has a sterling voting record on pro-Israel issues, and as chair of the Senate foreign relations committee, he has helped shepherd through key pro-Israel legislation.

His straightforwardness is considered an asset, even among those supporters who have disagreed with him.

"He's open-minded, he votes his own conscience," said Gary Erlbaum, a Philadelphia-based real estate developer who is backing Republican candidate John McCain for president but has supported Biden's Senate campaigns.

"I don't always agree with him" – Biden is a staunch critic of the George Bush administration's Iraq policy, while Erlbaum helped found the pro-Iraq war group Freedom's Watch – but "he does not try to sugarcoat."

Biden has been especially sharp in criticizing the United States and Israel in their failure to support Mahmoud Abbas in 2003 when he was the Palestinian Authority prime minister attempting to establish a power base to challenge then-president Yasser Arafat.

Abbas was eventually sidelined by Arafat, allowing the Palestinian leader to continue his policies of corruption and stasis until his death, and creating a vacuum ultimately filled in large part by Hamas terrorists.

"I've had my shouting matches over 25 years, privately, in my office and in the offices of prime ministers," Biden said in a March 2007 interview with the Forward. "I've had disagreements. Israel's a democracy and they make mistakes. But the notion that somehow if Israel just did the right thing, [the peace process] would work – I mean that's the premise – give me a break."

In that same interview, Biden firmly rejected calls for the United States to distance itself from Israel and assume a more neutral role in brokering Middle East peace talks.

"The suffering is real on both sides, but there is a side that can impact on ending it," he said. "The responsibility rests on those who will not acknowledge the right of Israel to exist, will not play fair, will not deal, will not renounce terror."

Just two months earlier, Biden took the lead in the Senate in rejecting the Iraq Study Group's assertion that the United States would not be able to achieve its goals in Iraq unless it "deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict."

"I do not accept the notion of linkage between Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict," Biden said during his opening remarks at a Jan. 17, 2007, Senate hearing. "Arab-Israeli peace is worth pursuing vigorously on its own merits, but even if a peace treaty were signed tomorrow, it would not end the civil war in Iraq."

Biden's longstanding relationship with the Jewish community should reassure Jews who still feel anxious about Obama, the Illinois senator who has deep ties to the Chicago Jewish community but has been on the national stage barely four years, said Cameron Kerry.

"I've seen the enormous respect [Biden] commands in the pro-Israel community," said Kerry, a convert to Judaism and a senior adviser to the 2004 presidential campaign of his brother, U.S. Senator John Kerry."He has a well-established record, he knows the issues, and he can talk the talk. He may be the best goyishe surrogate I've seen in the Jewish community."

Biden's son married into a Jewish family, but his keen interest in the region dates back to his first visit as a senator, not long before the 1973 Yom Kippur War. He met Israel's then-prime minister, Golda Meir.

In an interview with Shalom TV last year when he launched his own presidential bid, Biden said he came away from that meeting understanding that "there is this inextricable tie between culture, religion, ethnicity that most people don't fully understand – that is unique and so strong with Jews worldwide."

"When I was a young senator, I used to say, 'If I were a Jew, I'd be a Zionist.' I am a Zionist," he said. "You don't have to be a Jew to be a Zionist."

Mark Gittenstein, who worked for Biden from 1976 to 1989, said no one matched his breadth of knowledge on Israel, not even his Jewish staffers.

"He was much more knowledgeable about Israel and its problems than I was," Gittenstein said.

War in Georgia sparks a modest aliyah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The war in the former Soviet republic of Georgia has been a modest windfall for Israel in terms of aliyah.

In the wake of this month's Russian invasion, hundreds of Georgian Jews are expected to immigrate to Israel in the coming months, said Alex Katz, director of Jewish Agency activities in the former Soviet Union.

In an interview from Tbilisi, the capital of Georgia, Katz said that 75 Georgian Jews have already arrived in Israel and 100 Jews are waiting to leave.

Still another 200 Jews have expressed a desire to immigrate.

In his estimation, 500 to 600 Jews in this small Caucasus nation will leave in the next 12 months.

Many of the potential immigrants are young couples between the ages of 25 and 35. "It was a very nice surprise to us. Young couples want to immigrate. That's for sure."

Katz hastened to add that Georgia's remaining 7,000 or so Jews are not in any danger.

"They are located in complicated places," said Katz, a former Israeli army officer who has worked in the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe for the past two decades. "It's not dangerous to be a Jew in Georgia, but Georgia is in a war zone."

Since the eruption of the war, triggered by Georgia's armed incursion into neighbouring South Ossetia, nearly all Georgian Jews living in outlying communities, such as Gori, have streamed into Tbilisi.

In Gori, 90 kilometres north of the capital, less than 50 Jews remain, compared to 230 during the pre-war period.

"Some people came out of Gori without anything," he said.

Since the early 1970s, more than 20,000 Georgian Jews have made aliyah, some through youth programs, he said. "They are very well integrated into Israeli society."

Katz said the Jewish Agency has operated in Georgia – the birthplace of former Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin – since it achieved independence in 1991 after 69 years of Soviet domination.

Barrier rerouted

A change to the route of Israel's security barrier near the city of Ma'aleh Adumim will leave nearly 1,000 more acres on the Palestinian side. The route in the Jerusalem area will be moved to the west, the state prosecutor told Israel's Supreme Court. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak made the decision after residents of nearby Arab villages filed two petitions with the high court claiming the proposed route would prevent free movement and rob them of their land.

Jordan releases prisoners

Jordan released four prisoners convicted of killing an Israeli army officer and a soldier after they infiltrated the border in 1991. As a gesture of goodwill, Israel returned the four men to Jordan in 2007 to serve out their sentences. The transfer came with assurances the men would not be released before December 2009. But public pressure on the Jordanian government prompted the release following the prisoner exchange between Israel and Hezbollah, as well as the release by Israel of 200 Palestinian prisoners.

Peres' party

Israeli President Shimon Peres celebrated his 85th birthday with a party in Dimona in the Negev Desert. The party, which coincided with his birthday according to the Hebrew calendar, was intended to promote growth in the area. Peres was born in Poland and immigrated to Israel in 1934.

Aussie football

A joint Israeli-Palestinian team was in Australia last week to compete in an international Australian Rules football tournament. The 26-man "peace team" – 13 Israelis and 13 Palestinians aged 16 to 36 – conducted a sports clinic in Sydney for 160 Muslim, Jewish, Aboriginal and Christian youths. The team, an initiative of the Peres Center for Peace and its NGO partner, the Al-Quds Organization, will be in Melbourne to play this week against Britain, Papua New Guinea and Nauru. The Third International Cup is the sport's equivalent of soccer's World Cup. Eighteen countries, including Canada and the United States, are competing in Melbourne between Aug. 27 and Sept. 7.

Russian missiles

Syrian President Bashar Assad was in Moscow last week on an arms-purchasing mission. Assad was quoted in the Russian media as saying he will host Russian anti-aircraft missiles on Syrian territory – an apparent response to the deal signed recently to allow the United States to place a missile defence system in Poland.

Terrorism warning

Israel's Counterterrorism Bureau issued a rare global travel warning to its citizens last week. The advisory said Hezbollah is planning to attack Israelis throughout the world, with an emphasis on kidnappings.

The warning was not limited to any particular country. Israelis are being advised to turn down unexpected business or recreation proposals while abroad, as well as to avoid inviting unexpected visitors to their hotel rooms and to refrain from staying in secluded locations.

Tourism surges

Between January and July 2008, Russians tourists to Israel outnumbered the French, topping the list of European nationalities that have visited the country this year. Figures from the Tourism Ministry indicate a total of 1.7 million travellers visited Israel between January and July of 2008, compared to 1.2 million in the same period in 2007, a rise of 41 per cent.

About 388,000 travellers from the United States arrived in the country over the first seven months of the year, compared to 321,000 in the same period the year before, an increase of 21 per cent.

Musharraf criticized for accommodating Israel

The countries' foreign ministers met in Istanbul 2005, and after Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in September of that year, Musharraf said it was time for Pakistan to engage with Israel.

Even as Musharraf's 2005 speech to a Jewish audience in New York was criticized by Jews for being pro-Palestinian, it was criticized in Pakistan for being too accommodating of Israel.

Musharraf's resignation last week comes after months of political instability in Pakistan. Last fall, the president moved to suspend the country's constitution and scuttle planned parliamentary elections. Massive protests prompted Musharraf to back off and eventually resign his position as commander of the armed forces.

The assassination of opposition figure Benazir Bhutto last December further fuelled calls for Musharraf to resign as president. Some charged him with being complicit in the Bhutto slaying by not providing her with adequate security.

When he announced his resignation last week, Musharraf said he was doing so to spare the country his impeachment.

The president of Pakistan's senate, Muhammad Mian Soomro, becomes the acting president. According to Pakistani law, the next president must be chosen by the National Assembly and four provincial assemblies within 30 days.

The country's four-month-old coalition government is led by Asif Ali Zardari, who heads the Pakistan Peoples Party, and Nawaz Sharif, the chairman of the Pakistan Muslim League-N and a former prime minister. Sharif's term was ended in 1999 by Musharraf's bloodless coup.

Whoever emerges as the next president, analysts say the new leader is unlikely to wield the same broad-ranging powers as Musharraf.

Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, expressed fears that Pakistan could choose someone with an Islamist orientation.

"I'm very worried about it," he said.

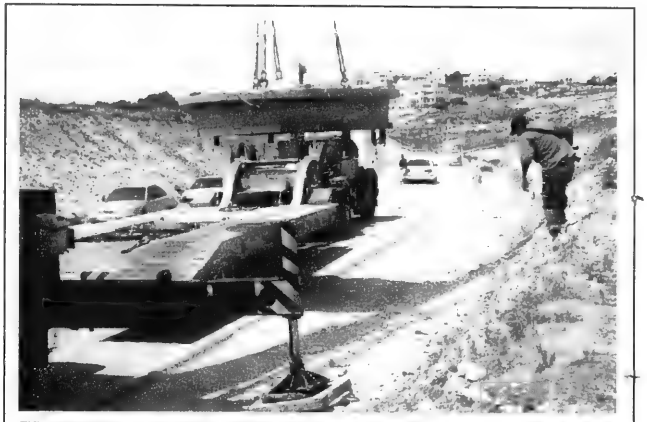
Nevertheless, Hoenlein and other Jewish organizational officials interviewed for this story stressed the ongoing contacts Jews have had with Pakistani governments over the years – long before Musharraf – and expressed confidence that they would persist in the future.

Pakistan's ambassador to the United Nations once even hosted a kosher lunch for some Jews at his residence, said Hoenlein, who attended the event.

Even if a pro-western regime endures in Islamabad, however, it isn't clear whether the next leader will be able to keep Pakistan's hard-line Islamists at bay.

Within hours of Musharraf's resignation last week, a suicide bomber in Pakistan's northwest province – a stronghold of the Pakistani Taliban – killed 23 people in a hospital emergency room, according to reports.

Syed Shahid Ali in Islamabad contributed to this report.



FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT: Israel Defence Forces personnel dismantle the Bir Nebala checkpoint near Ramallah. During the past month about 100 IDF checkpoints have been removed on the West Bank to allow ease of movement of Palestinians across the whole area. The latest checkpoint to be removed connects the Palestinian city of Ramallah with towns and villages located to the south of the city. This is the third important checkpoint to be dismantled this month and continues the Israel government's policy of allowing the Palestinians to lead as normal a daily life as possible, providing there is not a resurgence of terrorism in Israel. 1948...They Were There

'I'm no hero,' veteran of 1948 war says

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Most sergeants in the military aren't as affable as Howard Cossman.

But as part of the fighting Machal and as a leader of his brothers-in-arms in B company of the 72nd battalion of the nascent Israeli army in 1948, Cossman's friendly nature was often put to the test.

"A large part of the Machal volunteers were not trained in [the] military but came right out of their jobs or schools to join up in the Israeli armed forces," Cossman, 82, told The CJN in a recent interview.

"It takes a year or more to train a soldier for war. We had two days, that was it," he wrote in a brief recap specifically for this interview.

He called his fellow Machalniks "heroes and brave kids" who learned their duties under fire.

"We had to learn fast in order to be able to say we helped the state of Israel," Cossman recalled with a smile. "We all knew what we were fighting for. I feel lucky. I never regretted being there."

Howard Cossman somewhere in the Galilee in 1948.

A native Montrealer who later settled in Toronto and worked as an investment industry trader before retiring, Cossman said some of his proudest memories are of his time spent in Israel and fighting for the state's birth.

Cossman was one of the few Machalniks with military experience, having served in England and Germany in the Canadian Air Force from 1943 to 1946.

After VE Day, the Canadian military sent Cossman to Hamburg, Germany as part of the Allied occupation troops where he served for about seven months before returning to Canada, he said.

"While in Germany a few of us ... loaded up a truck with food and other necessities and drove to the [Bergen] Belsen concentration camp to give the people that were still there a little comfort. That was a trip I would like to forget," Cossman recalled.

After completing his service in Europe, Cossman admitted it was "difficult to adjust" upon his return to Canada.

He recalled the fateful day he decided to enlist with the Machal.

"One day in Montreal in 1947, on the back page of The Montreal Herald, there was a picture of a Jewish girl with a rifle on her shoulder and the caption underneath said 'This is who will fight the Arabs.' I was so unnerved, I thought, 'if this is all they've got, then I'm going to help."

So it was that he traded in his day job as a salesman and returned to military life, but this time for a cause close to his heart.

In April 1948, Cossman enlisted with the Machal despite the many people who tried to "talk me out of it," he said.

As with many Machalniks, his trip to British-occupied Palestine was a roundabout affair, going through many ports of call before finally docking in the Holy Land and being received by members of the Haganah somewhere near Tel Aviv.

"Don't forget, nobody in the world wanted us to do this," Cossman said, referring to the necessity for stealth by the Machal in travelling to the region.

Despite the secrecy, Cossman remembers his ship, the Marie Annik, breaking down somewhere in the middle of the Mediterranean and all the volunteers making the most of the occasion by swimming in the warm waters.

"That was a great part of the voyage," he laughed.

Cossman didn't want to get into the particulars of his time fighting in Israel – done mostly in the Galilee and at night versus the Arab armies – humbly insisting "I'm no hero" and shifting the story instead over to the men and women who fought with him for the establishment of the Jewish state.

"These volunteers were heroes. They were learning by experience and it wasn't always so pleasant. When I think back now, 60 years later, I admire and respect the unbelievable courage of these people. We had a big job to do and we did it well."

Howard Cossman today.

Cossman said he remembers that many of the Machal were survivors of concentration camps and it made them fearless in battle.

"They'd seen so much death that death didn't scare them anymore," he said.

Cossman recalled one example of this when one of the survivor-Machalniks was feeding his machine gun ammunition during a battle and was completely blasé about his whereabouts.

"I had to keep telling him to put his head down because he wasn't afraid [of the return fire overhead]," he said.

Outside of fighting, Cossman said his memories of Israel at that time were mostly fond.

"When I arrived... I looked around and saw that everyone was Jewish. Cops, street cleaners... everyone," he said. "I grew up in Montreal, brought up with gentiles, but in Israel all of us were Jews. It was wonderful."

Cossman also had a brief brush with a famous Israeli personage, encountering the first president of Israel, Chaim Wiezmann, while walking up the steps to his Tel Aviv hotel.

"I was dumbfounded, but managed to say 'Hello sir'. He said 'Hello' back and kept going," Cossman said, shaking his head.

After the war, Cossman hung around Israel for a while, working on a kibbutz as a night guard, but eventually returned to Canada in August 1949 after becoming homesick.

"I thought about staying in Israel, but I'm a city boy not a farmer. And to tell you the truth, I missed my family," he said.

Since then, Cossman said he's never returned, though he thinks about Israel often.

"I always wanted to go to the [Kotel] and daven. I pray every morning and believe in God very strongly," he said.

When asked for his thoughts about the modern-day state of Israel, Cossman is candid, saying he's proud of its achievements and amazed at the situation with the Arabs in the region.

"I'm very proud [because] Jews are out there in the world helping other countries with everything Israel has [to offer]. But the only thing the Arabs still have today that they had 60 years ago, is hatred for Israel."

Irgun operative sent Jews to Palestine via Italy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Amek Adler well remembers his inauguration into the clandestine world of aliyah bet the illegal immigration of Jewish refugees into then British-controlled Palestine.

The ceremony was something out of a spy novel. Adler, a young Holocaust survivor living in southern Italy, was ushered into a darkened room. There he found a simple table adorned with a white tablecloth lit by a single candle. Sitting on the table were a bible and a handgun.

Disembodied voices in the dark instructed him to pick up the pistol in his right hand and the bible in his left, and hold it close to his heart. He then repeated a pledge of allegiance to the Irgun and the Jewish state, which at the time was still a dream in Zionist's hearts.

Adler, now retired and living in Thornhill, still owns the original document issued him by the Irgun in postwar Italy, which contains the oath he read that day.

Amek Adler

With that pledge, he entered a dangerous underground world that could have landed him in an Italian or British prison.

Underscoring the dangerous times, he was issued a Tommy (submachine) gun, a handgun, and at times a British uniform, the better able to either fight the occupying British forces in Italy or fool them.

Luckily he never had to use the gun, but there was plenty of risk in defying British authorities and sending young Jews to Palestine under their noses.

In the postwar years, Britain retained its mandate over Palestine, but acceding to Arab pressure, reversed its commitment to a Jewish homeland by severely restricting Jewish immigration. Instead of permitting Jews to settle the land, ships with thousands of illegals were captured by the British navy and rerouted to Cyprus, where Holocaust survivors became reacquainted with barbed wire camps.

Aliyah Beth was designed to circumvent British immigration restrictions and bring to the yishuv refugees who'd survived Hitler's Europe.

Adler was among a small group of activists who manned the last portion of the European leg of the journey. Gathered by Irgun operatives across Europe, the refugees were funnelled down to southern Italy, where Adler's group, operating out of Santa Cesarea Terme, took over. They were the ones who brought the prospective immigrants to dark Italian beaches and ferried them to freighters waiting silently a few hundred metres offshore. Armed with the Tommy guns, Adler and the others rowed them in overloaded boats to the waiting ships.

The other significant aspect of his work as an Irgun operative was to "make mischief" for the British. At night he and colleagues would use stencils and paint to leave a message on British army trucks calling for free Jewish immigration to Palestine. It was done "to let the Italian population know what the British were doing to us," he said.

Adler said that while he was armed and ready to do battle with the Brits, that never transpired. There were still plenty of moments fraught with danger for Adler. One he recalls vividly occurred while riding an Italian train from his southern base to Rome. Clad in a British army uniform and carrying a concealed weapon, Adler travelled without a ticket. When the train stopped in Bari, a conductor went through the rail car calling for "biglietto," tickets. Outside Adler could see British military police patrolling. He knew if caught he faced years in prison.

Thinking quickly, he pulled out the only document he had on him – a Betar ID card and said in his best Italian, "secret," suggesting he was on a special mission.

"He looked it over and asked who the picture [on the card] was," Adler recalled. Although it was Ze'ev Jabotinsky, founder of the Betar Zionist youth movement, Adler said it was U.S. president Harry Truman. "He saluted the picture and gave it back to me," Adler recounted.

It was a nerve-wracking experience. "When he walked away, you could have drained my uniform of sweat," he said.

For 2-1/2 years, Adler worked in southern Italy, fulling expecting to one day make the trip to Israel himself. Then fate intervened. News came to him that his mother and sister-in-law, whom he had assumed had been killed in Auschwitz, survived the Nazi camps and were living in Sweden.

His family, which had suffered from the Nazi onslaught, had two more survivors.

Adler had grown up in Lodz, Poland in 1928, one of four brothers who were active in Betar. Not long after the Nazi invasion, his oldest brother Arthur, was sent to forced labour but – as Amek learned after the war – escaped and made his way to the Soviet Union. There he was imprisoned as a German spy and sent to Siberia. He was released with 100,000 other Polish subjects, including later Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, and sent to Palestine to train under the British with the goal of forming a Polish legion. Arthur saw action in Italy and was at the famed battle of Monte Cassino when the Polish brigade took the German-held stronghold when other Allied units failed.

In the meantime, Adler's father had died on the deportation train to a German concentration camp while one brother, Joseph, was shot attempting to escape the transport.

He and Ben, the fourth brother, found themselves in Dachau near war's end. At the time, Germany made a deal to swap 1,500 young Jews in exchange for German POWs and Adler was among the group selected. In April 1945, they were hustled on board a train. Ben, suffering from typhus, remained in the camp.

En route the prisoners were told to get off the train in a clearing in a grass-covered valley near the Austrian border.

Adler said he grew suspicious when he saw the area ringed with German machine guns so at night he and two others crawled out of the area through the high grass. They escaped into a forest and spent the next day and a half hiding from the Germans. He doesn't know what happened to the prisoners left behind.

Took oath with pistol in one hand, a bible in the other

At night they slept on straw in a farmer's barn. When they awoke, the area was crawling with soldiers – American GIs from the 3rd Army – who he identified by the white stars on their tanks.

When the Americans saw the former prisoners "they looked at us like we were from outer space." Adler was wearing a striped prisoner uniform and weighed only 70 lbs.

He was sent to a military hospital where he was nursed back to health. When his strength returned, he got permission to return to Dachau to search for Ben. He found his brother alive and the family reunion was extended when Arthur, the British soldier, found them in Dachau through the Red Cross.

After Arthur returned to his unit, Amek decided to travel to Palestine, via Italy, where Arthur was stationed.

Amek joined a Betar kibbutz in Santa Cesaria Terme, on the heel of the Italian boot. "I became very active because I'm very outspoken," he said. That may well have attracted the attention of Irgun recruiters, who interviewed him a couple of times before offering him a place in the organization.

For 2-1/2 years he worked for the Irgun and after helping hundreds make their way to Palestine/Israel – many of them former Russian soldiers – eventually he too considered the trip. But unexpected news prompted a change of plan.

His brother Ben learned that their mother and his wife had survived the war and were living in Sweden. "They wanted me to come to Sweden," Amek said. "The Irgun people said, 'go see your mother. You can go to Israel later on.'"

When Israel's war for independence broke out Amek was eager to join Machal, the overseas volunteers fighting for the Jewish state. "But my mother said, 'one brother is in Britain (Arthur), the other is in Canada (Ben and his wife Etta) and Joseph is dead. How can you leave me?'"

"The changed my mind and I remained in Sweden for seven years."

Eventually he joined Ben and Etta in Canada, where he started his own family. He never did get to Israel, except as a visitor on six occasions.

Retired from the fur and jewelry businesses, Adler is a sought-after speaker on the Holocaust and has accompanied the March of the Living to Europe and Israel several times.

One of those trips proved particularly cathartic to him. Back in Poland, when incarcerated at the Radom labour camp, he witnessed a German SS officer murder a Jewish mother, father and two children after one boy escaped. They were shot in the back of the head and the last thing he heard them say was Shema Yisrael, an affirmation of faith.

That scene haunted him every time he heard the Shema in synagogue. But on the March of the Living, 260 youngsters sang it joyfully and with spirit. "Every time in synagogue I hear Shema Yisrael since then, I don't see that Radom Shema Yisrael anymore," he said.

"Now I imagine the happy Shema Yisrael being song by Canadian kids."

Jazz musician aims to make a living while making art

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

Toronto native Michael Ruby was encouraged to pursue jazz music professionally by his father, who died when Ruby was in his late teens.

"I went into it because of my father, who told me to do what makes me happy," the 21-year-old saxophonist, composer and bandleader said.

"He told me not to always go for the money. Just do something that you're going to have fun doing, because you want to make the most of life."

Ruby took his father's advice to heart, and now has a debut CD and a scholarship to the prestigious Manhattan School of Music, among other accomplishments, to show for it.

He started playing jazz at the age of 14, when he took up the saxophone in order to join his high school band. It was a surprisingly late beginning in light of his later success. Since then, Ruby has continued to evolve and explore new territory as an artist and shows no signs of slowing down.

"I never really stopped playing once I started," he said. "I just couldn't put the sax down. Once I found music, I fell in love with it and haven't stopped playing."

After two years at the York School, Ruby transferred to Forest Hill Collegiate in pursuit of a highly recommended music teacher, who happened to leave the school just before he arrived.

"I ended up skipping most of my music classes to practise," he admitted.

In 2005, he enrolled in the University of Toronto's jazz performance program. That way he was able to stay close to his family after the loss of his father, who had battled cancer for three years.

"That was more important to me than going to school in the States," Ruby said. "It turned out to be a great move because that year there was a huge Canadian jazz competition that was the first of its kind and hasn't been repeated since."

After submitting a CD of original music, he was selected as one of five contestants to perform at a local jazz bar for representatives from Universal Records and well-known Canadian musicians. His performance propelled him to the top of the Project Jazz competition and earned him a record deal with Alma, the jazz branch of Universal Records.

That year, Ruby was selected to play with the Canada All Star Jazz Band, in Vancouver, and was named the winner of Downbeat jazz magazine's Outstanding Performance on Tenor Saxophone Award.

Mike Ruby, who released his debut album, Play Time, last year, is seen above performing with Brazilian composer and musician Hermeto Pascoal.

His album Play Time, released in 2007, is made up of 10 songs, eight of them originals. The two other tracks are Someday My Prince Will Come (Miles Davis recorded a classic rendition) and Giant Steps by Ruby's greatest musical inspiration, John Coltrane.

"Coltrane was my first influence," Ruby said. "I just listened to him all of the time. I fell asleep and woke up listening to his albums."

Ruby expects to have another album released within the next year and a half.

In August 2007, he began his first of four years at the Manhattan School of Music, the sole tenor saxophone player in his class.

"This year [the Manhattan School of Music] was rated the top school in the world for jazz," he said. "I've been looking up to that school my whole life. It's a dream school."

In addition to getting a first-class formal education in New York, Ruby credits the city with allowing him to build relationships with many of his favorite musicians and to learn from them.

He was thrilled to tour with the renowned drummer Ari Hoenig this summer.

"I've played with a lot of great professionals, but that was the only time that I got to tour with my favourite drummer," Ruby said. "It's really an honour when someone of that stature selects you to play with them. It was the most musically fulfilling experience I've ever had and one of the most incredible times of my life."

He is currently touring eastern and western Canada, as well parts of the western United States, with his group The Mike Ruby/Le Boeuf Brothers Quintet.

"I'm having a blast. The music is incredible, and it's amazing to play music with your best friends," he said.

While he's having a good time, Ruby is realistic about the financial pressures that come with playing jazz for a living.

"My goal is to become successful and to make a decent living, but also to make sure I don't lose anything artistically," he said.

"So far I'm on the road to where I want to be – playing music all the time and creating art all the time – and being able to make a living doing that."

Kapuscinski's poetry had ethical foundation

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The recent death of Alexander Solzhenitsyn reminds us of a time when, in another part of the world, literature was the ground for social transformation as well as the voice of the individual trapped in a struggle with grotesque forms of state power. In his later years, Solzhenitsyn became a parody of himself, his politics out of touch and his Russian audience disinterested, but there can be no doubt that his first book, One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, contributed to the collapse of the Gulag system it depicted. A great literature of resistance grew up in the countries under Soviet rule, producing writers who stayed at home and wrote against the status quo, and others, like Ryszard Kapuscinski, who chose to write mostly about the world abroad, while paying oblique attention to the difficult lives of men and women under Communism.

Norman Ravvin

Kapuscinski is best known as a writer of literate travelogues, a first rate journalist who described war zones and the victims of political machinations in such far-flung locales as Ethiopia and Iran. His best known books include The Soccer War, Imperium and Shah of Shahs. Dead now more than a year, he was born in 1932 in the Polish river city of Pinsk, where, as a child, he experienced Soviet occupation, his family's flight to German-occupied Warsaw and the disaster of Nazi rule in eastern Europe.

Throughout years of travel and journalistic dispatches Kapuscinski was said to maintain two notebooks – one for news agency stories, and another in which he gathered the material for his books. Apparently a third notebook was in play, in which he wrote poems. The appearance in English of a selection of this work under the title I Wrote Stone is made possible by the labours of two Toronto-based translators, Diana Kuprel and Marek Kusiba.

I Wrote Stone offers short lyric sketches that suggest the themes of Kapuscinski's major works without delving into them in great detail. The upheavals of his own wartime youth are evoked by a meditation on a photograph of a Polish "grandmother," dated 1913:

You don't know yet
what I've long known:
in a year everything will shudder, armies will mount.

The chaos brought on by the collapse of colonialism in Africa is conveyed sharply in the image of a glimpse caught

On a plane to Luanda a young soldier lies on a stretcher
that morning a bullet shattered his skull

A number of poems investigate the paradoxical relevance and fragility of the writer's existence. Compatriots rise like wraiths in Kapuscinski's spare language, peopling a lost world that is at once quaint and sad. The Polish writer Arnold Slucki is envisioned this way:

Before leaving for Jerusalem
he would stroll down New World Street
he would look without seeing anyone an old coat without a single button his forehead always sweated his pocket full of poems

Translator Diana Kuprel highlights the ethical foundations of Kapuscinski's writing, his attention to what she calls the "borderland perspective of the forgotten, the invisible, the marginal – ordinary people. By allowing these people to speak . . . he records the living history of those not usually deemed worthy to enter the annals of official history." Kapuscinski has called history a "battle between culture and boorishness, between humanity and bestiality." His poems return again and again to the question of how one awakens "in / oneself the desire to be a human being," alongside the related challenge

To locate the pure word which didn't slander didn't snitch
didn't take part in a raid didn't declare black white

In the countries Kapuscinski knew that were compromised, either by totalitarianism or war, this was the writer's goal.

The Book of Israeli Food is a great culinary compendium

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is indeed a land of milk and honey ... and cheese, olives, pomegranates, oranges and so on.

Practically self-sufficient in food production and a world leader in cutting edge agricultural techniques, Israel is a bountiful country where you can be a gourmet or a gourmand.

Whether you prefer home cooking or restaurant meals, Israel is ready for you, offering a cornucopia of gustatory delights.

This was not always the case.

In the early, austere days of Israeli statehood, rationing was in force and a really good meal was hard to come by. But happily, this era is long gone, judging at least by Janna Gur's The Book of Israeli Food: A Culinary Journey (Random House).

In this fat, comprehensive, handsomely illustrated coffee-table book, Gur, an immigrant from the former Soviet Union, covers it all.

She writes about Ashkenazi and Sephardi dishes, from borscht and chopped liver to stuffed vegetables and bourekas.

She surveys the contemporary restaurant scene, observing that dining out has become all the rage.

She visits aromatic open air markets in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa, where the freshest produce and the finest fish and meats are available.

She delivers odes on the hearty Israeli breakfast and the equally famous Israeli salad.

And if that is not enough, Gur sings the praises of Israeli soul food like hummus, falafel, shawarma and shakshuka.

In passing, she offers tips on the many uses of eggplant, immortalizes the Israeli grill and pays homage to Israel's excellent line of breads, rolls, cheeses and olive oils.

And if this has whetted your appetite, read on.

The Book of Israeli Food, a fine blend of text and photographs, is chock full of mouth-watering recipes for dishes running the gamut from roasted eggplants with red peppers and good old-fashioned chicken soup to "magical" honey cake and North African hot fish stew.

Creativity of artist, 93, continues to flow

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Helen Gameroff began her lifelong vocation as an artist in her public school days.

Helen Gameroff, 93, has always loved to draw and paint.

She has created artworks in traditional and impressionistic styles, using a variety of techniques and materials – watercolours, oil, silk-screening, shells and fabric.

Now a resident of The Terrace at Baycrest, Gameroff's apartment is a gallery of her works that extends into the hallway.

"My mother could do so many things," says Myrna Schwartz, Gameroff's daughter, who was visiting her mother during the interview with The Canadian Jewish News.

"Along with her many artistic ventures, my mother entertained without using a caterer, she made all the curtains and drapes in the house, and she even made us very stylish clothing," Schwartz says.

Gameroff (née Josefo) was born in Montreal and moved to Toronto from Montreal three years ago.

"When I was in public school, I was always the best artist," says the sprightly Gameroff.

She took courses at École des Beaux-Arts, graduated from MacDonald Teachers College and taught at Mount Royal Public School.

As a teenager during the Depression, she made Christmas cards and sold them to her neighbours. "I would also knock on the doors of businesses and stores to see if they needed any posters. I loved to see my posters in the store windows," she says.

After her marriage to Louis Gameroff, she continued taking art lessons and participated in class exhibitions. Her husband operated a men's clothing store in Lachine, Que., and while she was raising her three children, she continued painting and expanded into other areas of the arts.

"I had very good handwriting skills, and I began to do calligraphy commercially, creating invitations, seating cards and posters for large parties and simchahs," Gameroff says.

"One of my assignments was to do the invitations for former prime minister Jean Chrétien's daughter's wedding and many other prestigious events. But, although I was very busy with calligraphy, I always continued painting."

She has sold some of her works, but says she would rather give them to the members of her family or donate them to charity fundraising events.

She loved living in Montreal, but she was getting lonely there since her daughter Rosalind Belitsky, lives in Halifax, Myrna is in Whitby, Ont., and her son, Douglas, lives in Toronto." Gameroff has six grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren.

When she moved to The Terrace, Gameroff says she "had to do something artistic. I got involved with flower pressing, and I create colourful bookmarks, cards and placemats."

She says water-colour painting is still her first love, but she doesn't have enough space in her apartment to paint there.

Gameroff participates in many activities at The Terrace and is a volunteer remedial reading teacher at a local school.

Photographs preserve graffiti masterpieces

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For her sixth one-woman photo exhibition, noted Toronto photo artist May Karp has chosen a controversial subject.

StreetSpeaks, which runs from Sept. 6 to 27 at the Moore Gallery, features Karp's colourful photographs of graffiti, which focus on graffiti as an art form.

Artist May Karp

Karp says that her photographs document good graffiti art and that she is showing this art on gallery walls where it belongs.

"In Paris, some 30 years ago, I saw graffiti as an art form for the first time. It covered the banks of the Seine River," she recalls.

Karp says the rounded shapes of the graffiti she saw were not the typical unappealing scrawl that we are all familiar with. Instead, they were lyrical and sensual.

From that moment in Paris, she began thinking of graffiti as art, as well as artists' motivation for creating them.

Over the past two years, in her travels to Spain, France, Portugal, the Canary Islands, the United States and throughout Canada, she has searched for graffiti and photographed them.

Karp, a retired businesswoman who has always been interested in architecture and design, began taking pictures in earnest in the 1990s. For her 65th birthday, she donated her first photo exhibit to Baycrest Centre.

With encouragement from other artists and friends, she has mounted five other successful one-woman exhibitions at the Moore Gallery. These included photographs of landscapes, flowers, people and architecture.

Karp's photographs are in numerous institutional and corporate collections, including Canuck Properties; Alex Chapman Design; Metro Toronto Condo Corp. #802; and Torys LLP; and in private collections in Canada, the United States, India, Israel, England, France and Japan.

"You might find this show different from the others," she says. "When you see it through the eyes of these young artists, you will understand that change is here."

She notes that throughout history, drawings have been made on rock and on walls as a form of communication.

"Today, graffiti is still a form of communication, but it is much broader in its subjects. Some are personal to the artist and how the artist sees the world. Some are protests. Some are slogans. Some are commentaries on the political scene. And some are just satirical."

Karp says that in certain cities, graffiti art is appreciated and encouraged by local authorities, with public space allocated for this artistic expression.

In other places, graffiti remains an outlawed art form and are painted over or erased by the authorities. Also, the elements destroy graffiti. "Photos are the sole testament to their existence," she says.

She believes that talented people should have designated public places in which they can display their art.

StreetSpeaks bears witness to masterpieces produced by what have become known as the "art orphans" from around the globe. Photographs like Karp's preserve this type of art for the future.

The Moore Gallery is located at 80 Spadina Rd. Gallery hours are Tuesday through Saturday, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.The opening reception for StreetSpeaks takes place on Sept. 6, with Karp in attendance.

ISRAEL TOURISM AT ALL-TIME HIGH

About 1.7 million tourists visited Israel in the first seven months of 2008, an increase of 41 per cent over the same period last year, when one million tourists visited. Officials in Israel's Tourism Ministry are optimistic that this will be a record year for tourism, with 2.8 million visitors by the end of 2008.

The Tourism Ministry is currently working to improve the professionalism of passport officials, security personnel and tour guides across the country. The ministry recently held a two-day workshop for bus drivers, aimed at improving service.

Beaufort chronicles Israel's last days in southern Lebanon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Joseph Cedar's action drama, Beaufort, which opened in Toronto last week, is taut and depressing.

Israel's nominee for best foreign film at this year's Academy Awards, Beaufort grimly unfolds at a besieged Israeli military outpost on the eve of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000.

The fortress, built within the ruins of an old Crusader castle on top of a mountain commanding a panoramic view of the surrounding countryside, is manned by a group of Israeli soldiers.

The troops cower in reinforced concrete bunkers, having been ordered to lie low to prevent further fatalities. Israel's occupation of Lebanon is swiftly coming to a close, but Hezbollah continues to shell the outpost with mortars and rockets, hoping to create the perception that Israel's forthcoming withdrawal will be seen as an abject retreat.

Although he is intent on preserving the lives of his men, the young commander of the outpost, Liraz (Oshri Cohen), cannot ignore Hezbollah provocations.

A road that connects the outpost to the Israeli border has been mined, and a bomb disposal expert, Ziv (Ohad Knoller), is brought in to investigate. Ziv is a seasoned and cautious sapper, but who knows what may happen when he attempts to dismantle that device? Cedar ramps up the tension as a specially trained dog is sent toward the object. Ziv, clad in a helmet, visor and body suit, follows the dog.

Oshri Cohen plays the commander of the fortress.

As the days progress, more Hezbollah rockets land on the outpost, causing casualties and damage. Before a projectile lands, a disembodied voice calls out, "Incoming, incoming," warning soldiers to run into shelters.

In Cedar's film, Hezbollah is portrayed as an unseen, deadly force, an enemy that prompts some of the soldiers to question Israel's tactical and strategic policy in Lebanon.

Cedar creates a palpable atmosphere of fear as the bombardments escalate in frequency and ferocity. In keeping with the sombre mood, the sky is usually leaden, gray with heavy clouds waiting to burst into rain.

As might be expected, the soldiers' language is colloquial and profane as they discuss a variety of topics from women to war. The actors who portray these troops deliver stellar performances.

Hard and unyielding, Beaufort implicitly questions Israel's presence in Lebanon, but it is not a conventional anti-war film. Indeed, Beaufort leaves the impression that Israel cannot afford to let down its guard.

Renanim Youth Singers launch second CD

The Renanim Youth Singers, a choir conducted by Susan Michaels, is celebrating Israel's 60th anniversary and inaugurating the start of its 10th year with the launch of its second CD, Israel at 60 – Despair to Triumph.

Wide-ranging repertoire on this inspiringly beautiful CD includes songs commemorating the horrors of the Holocaust to music expressing the pure joy of Israel and its accomplishments. The CD launch is Sept. 2 at the Beth David B'nai Israel Synagogue.

This award-winning Jewish community children's choir has much to be proud of in its short history. In June, the Renanim Youth Singers won a North American-wide publishing contest, sponsored by TransContinental Music, with the song Adon Olam, by Toronto composer Ben Steinberg. The choir's recording of this song will be on a CD with other winning contest songs. The CD will be distributed throughout North America and beyond.

Documentary filmmaker Donald Grey is using the choir's recorded Holocaust repertoire in a film about Eva Olssen, a survivor who has received the Order of Ontario. The film's opening will be at a gala fundraiser at Deerhurst Resort next month. It will also be shown during Holocaust Education Week in November.

As part of its 10th anniversary celebrations, the choir will be travelling to Detroit this December to sing with other Jewish youth choirs in a Chanukah music festival. The choristers are also looking forward to a fun retreat at Green Acres Camp next month, to prepare for the Detroit festival and a hectic fall performance schedule.

The choir has accomplished much as it begins its second decade. It won several gold medals at the Kiwanis Music Festival and completed a tour of Israel immediately after the Second Lebanon War.

Author Bezmozgis to direct feature film

The award-winning author of Natasha and Other Stories, will make his feature film directorial debut with the drama, Victoria Day, based on his own script which was originally accepted to the 2006 Sundance Screenwriters Lab.

"Victoria Day has been eight years in the making," said David Bezmozgis. "I wrote the script even before I wrote the stories for my book, Natasha. For people who know my work, Victoria Day will seem familiar. For others, it will be familiar in the way that teenage experience is familiar to us all."

Starring newcomer William Moore as Ben Spektor, Victoria Day is a wry coming-of-age story of a teenager who grapples with new world opportunities and old world expectations.

It is May 1988 in Toronto. The school year is coming to a close. The Victoria Day long weekend heralds the beginning of summer. In Boston, Wayne Gretzky's dynastic Edmonton Oilers are playing in the Stanley Cup Finals. Best of all, Bob Dylan is coming to town.

Spektor, 16, attends the concert with his two closest friends, Sammy and Noah. Outside the concert, Ben sees what looks like a routine exchange: two teenagers buying drugs. In a way he could never have predicted, the consequences of this drug deal will alter the course of his summer and, quite possibly, the rest of his life. Over the span of one week, seemingly disparate forces converge on him – the search for a missing boy, his romance with the boy's sister, the Stanley Cup finals, the fortunes of his own hockey team, and a peculiar Vietnam re-enactment with Victoria Day firecrackers.

These events conspire to displace the certainty of childhood with the disorientation of adulthood.

Principal photography will run from September 5- October 1, 2008 in Toronto. Victoria Day will be released in 2009.

'Lovable' Israel singer understands the power of his own voice

Now, a year after winning Israeli Idol, Mauda is comfortable on stage. He has since toured Europe, and last week, he performed in Toronto at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign launch.

One of his favourite memories of the Israeli Idol competition was performing with Israeli superstar David Broza, during the final episode.

After the performance, Broza took off a silver necklace he had worn for many years and placed it around Mauda's neck.

Last May, Mauda represented Israel in Eurovision, a Europe-wide singing competition. For the competition, Mauda sang The Fire in Your Eyes, in Hebrew and English.

It was after Eurovision that Mauda began to understand the power of his voice. "After Eurovision, a lot of people came up to me… people that don't understand my language," he said.

He realized that "even people that don't understand what I'm talking about will love me. It made me want to continue to [reach] them."

"Since Eurovision, I've thought of how to let fans and listeners communicate with me. This is what keeps me going, this is my bond with them."

Currently, Mauda is working on his first album.

"It changes and updates as we speak. I've been working on it for four months. It's very hard. I'm trying to know who I am and what I want to say to people. I want to sing about pure and sheer joy. The power ballads will be sad and soft with an optimistic ending," he said.

Mauda's music is upbeat, reflecting his personality. "I'm always happy, I laugh most of the time," he said.

If it were not for Israeli Idol, Mauda would have studied to become a physiotherapist. In fact, he still plans to enrol in a university physiotherapy program eventually.

"My grandfather was a physiotherapist. It's part of my genes," he said.

Right now, however, Mauda is concentrating on his music.

"I feel like a therapist. I send energy throughout my vocals. It's all about energy. When you translate energy into songs, the message is very clear," he said.

"A lot of people come to me and say, 'You're a healer with your vocals.' I didn't understand what they meant until I realized that this is what I'm here to do. To heal and make people happy."

Mauda has learned a lot about the music industry, and even more about himself, since he won the competition.

"Music should stay genuine. You need to be authentic, be yourself, you can't be afraid of anything. You need to be sure about the music," he said.

According to Elad Weissman, Mauda's creative and promotional manager, the secret to Mauda's success is simple.

"He's stayed the same. That's the secret. He's lovable," he said.

Eye on Arts

By BILL GLADSTONE

THERESA TOVA, FLORY JAGODA, MANY OTHERS AT ASHKENAZ UNTIL SEPT. 1

Singer-actor Theresa Tova performs Oy is Dus a Leben: A Tribute to the Great Women of the Yiddish Theatre at the Ashkenaz Festival. Tova and musical director Brian Katz and band lead a journey through the songs and stories of enterprising female stars, including Regina Prager, Bessie Thomashefsky and Molly Picon. "Every song, every woman, every story has love and pain entangled." Enwave Theatre, Harbourfront Centre, Sunday, Aug. 31, 9 p.m. $25; $18 in advance.

Ladino Performer at Ashkenaz: Flory Jagoda, a Sarajevo-born authority in Ladino music whose family included generations of well-known singers and musicians, has been maintaining the Ladino tradition ever since coming to the United States after the Holocaust. Now in her 80s, Jagoda performs Judea-Spanish Songs from Bosnia with her apprentice Susan Gaeta and a trio of local musicians. Ashkenaz Festival, Enwave Theatre, Harbourfront Centre, Monday, Sept. 1, 1:15 p.m. $18; $15 in advance.
The Ashkenaz Festival runs Aug. 26 to Sept. 1. For details, visit the website www.ashkenazfestival.com.

Inglorious Bastards: Pulp Fiction director Quentin Tarantino is set to take on the Nazis in an upcoming movie, Inglorious Bastards, that will feature Brad Pitt in a leading role.

One of Tarantino's trademarks is the use of gratuitous violence, and there should be plenty of it in Inglorious Bastards. The project is is based loosely on a 1978 film by the same name. It is slated to go into production in Berlin in mid-October.

The story involves a group of American-Jewish soldiers who are dropped into Nazi-occupied Europe to wreak havoc on the Germans and destroy their morale. According to news reports based on a leaked version of the script, their commanding officer demands that the men bring him 100 Nazi scalps, any way they can, or die trying.

According to reports, the film will be filled with gory new ways to commit murder graphically on film. If it is at all like the director's previous works, there will be many depictions of debased humanity, but few if any heroes. In a recent interview, Tarantino said Inglorious Bastards wouldn't feel like a "period film" but would be "a modern, in-your-face movie."

Another high-profile American film about World War II is reportedly in the final stages of production. In contrast to Tarantino, actor-director Tom Cruise was apparently possessed by an impulse to glorify not violence but a would-be war hero in Valkyrie. The upcoming movie focuses on Count Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg, the German who tried to blow up Hitler, and is scheduled for a December release.

Arts in Brief

• Mitch Smolkin performs with Klezmer En Buenos Aires, Levon Ichkhanian, Boris Sichon, Paul Brody and Aviva Chernick in celebration of the release of Smolkin's new album, A Star Is Born. Ashkenaz Festival; Enwave Theatre, Harbourfront Centre, Saturday, Aug. 30, 7 p.m. $18; $25 at the door. www.mitchsmolkin.com

• Ventriloquist and storyteller Yehudit (Judy) Shier Weisberg and her counterpart Yossel enter the world of the shtetl in fun Jewish stories filled with colourful characters and valuable lessons for life. A teacher, writer and performer, Weisberg presents A Shlemiel, A Mentsch and a Miser in the Lakeside Terrace Tent of Harbourfront Centre in two free performances. Sunday, Aug. 31, 4:30 p.m. and Monday, Sept. 1, 5 p.m.

• The Judaica Sound Archives at Florida Atlantic University Libraries has posted on its website a large collection of Jewish musical and spoken recordings, many in Yiddish, Hebrew and even Ladino. There is a good representation of cantorial and theatre selections, ranging from the days of 78 rpm recordings to the present. The website is at www.fau.edu/jsa.

Talented writer/actress pens play about developmentally challenged sister

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

When Sara Farb speaks, her big brown eyes sparkle, expressing a passion for life.

Farb, 21, is an actor, playwright, director and singer, who most recently was seen as Tess in The Sisters Rosensweig at the Jane Mallet Theatre. In addition to acting, singing and writing, Farb studies English literature at the University of Toronto.

When you see Farb in action, on stage or in person, you know you are witnessing the blossoming of an incredible talent. I had the pleasure of first seeing her at the Tarragon's Paprika Festival last spring, where she wrote, directed and performed in her one-woman show, R-E-B-E-C-C-A, an autobiographical glimpse into the world of her 15-year-old sister, who is developmentally challenged.

Farb plays her real-life sister, Rebecca, who has the mental capacity of a three-year-old, but emotionally is going through the typical angst of a teenaged girl.

Although the play is only 20 minutes long, it is an extremely candid and riveting work, capsulizing Rebecca's innermost thoughts about her family, being "mentally retarded" and coming of age. The script reveals these sentiments, as if Rebecca were able to articulate her own feelings and thoughts.

Farb wrote R-E-B-E-C-C-A to explore the dilemma that she herself has faced throughout her life. "Is it possible to be jealous of someone who is mentally retarded? Even now, when I'm studying for exams, I often think to myself, "This is something Rebecca is never going to have to worry about. If she does, it's on a simpler level. How can you not envy something like that?"

Farb said having a sister like Rebecca is "a gift. Cousins, grandparents and friends are all involved with Rebecca. Everyone adores her."

The audience squirmed in their seats for a second or two when Rebecca first blurts out to the audience that she is mentally retarded.

By the time Rebecca turned one, her development was noticeably delayed and her parents searched for an answer. When they took her to Boston, the doctors confirmed that Rebecca was indeed "mentally retarded."

"For the first few years, it was fine because Rebecca could get away with being adorable, but as she grew up, she has stayed two to three years old, is going through puberty, and it's really hard. There's no filter, there are no social graces."

Farb's family has been extremely supportive of the play, but they do find it difficult to watch, as it hits very close to home.

"People have asked me if it's is difficult to do the play and how I go there. I treat it as another endeavour. I really don't let it get to me."

R-E-B-E-C-C-A has been well received and was recently presented at the Luminato festival and Summerworks.

Farb has also co-produced Edges, a song cycle that will be remounted by a professional theatre company this fall.

MONTREAL — Canadian and Israeli doctors have formally agreed to work together in areas of common interest, including lobbying for reciprocity in postgraduate training programs and speciality certification, and sharing expertise in emergency preparedness and the integration of foreign doctors.

The Canadian Medical Association (CMA) and Israel Medical Association (IMA) signed a 10-point letter of agreement during the CMA's annual general meeting in Montreal last week that strengthens their bilateral relations and expresses a desire for further collaboration, including in the international arena.

In addition to exchanging information on professional issues, the points of agreement include one of a political nature. The CMA and IMA state that they will act jointly to try to persuade the Arab countries to increase their level of involvement in the World Medical Association (WMA).

IMA president Dr. Yoram Blachar, one of the signatories of the agreement with outgoing CMA president Dr. Brian Day, is the incoming WMA president. While three Arab countries – Egypt, Kuwait and Tunisia – are nominally WMA members, they are not active, Blachar said, and he has pledged that reaching out to these and other Arab countries will be a priority of his term of office, which begins in October.

The WMA, founded in 1947, is the umbrella organization of 85 national medical associations, representing nine million physicians.

This is only the second formal agreement with another national medical association (the other being the United States) that the CMA has entered into, said its secretary general and CEO William Tholl, who is also a signatory along with Leah Wapner, IMA secretary-general. It's the first such bilateral agreement to which the IMA is party.

"There have been many efforts over the years to bring in the Arab countries," Tholl said. "The CMA has historically acted as a broker in the world, including that part of the world."

There is no overt Arab boycott because of Israel's membership in the WMA. Tholl thinks the Arab absence may have more to do with culture; African nations are also not well represented on the WMA.

The CMA-IMA agreement builds on an already existing good relationship between the two bodies, as well as personal relationships between members, Tholl and Blachar said.

The CMA has 68,000 members, representing about 85 per cent of the medical profession in Canada, Tholl said.

"The CMA and IMA share a long list of common values, including a commitment to excellence in patient care, a determination to protect the interests of physicians and a desire to dialogue with other organizations on issues of common interest," the agreement begins.

The two associations say they will work jointly to make it possible for medical graduates from Canada and Israel to pursue postgraduate training in the other country, whether in clinical care or research, as well as for specialists to be recognized in each country.

The two associations think they can learn from each other in how to handle disasters, whether natural or man-made. "For example, the CMA has been through the SARS experience while the IMA has much experience in planning for mass trauma casualties and natural disaster planning," the agreement reads.

The CMA is especially interested in knowing more about how Israel was able to absorb so many foreign physicians, mainly from the former Soviet Union, in such a short space of time.

Between 1989 and 1994, about 12,000 doctors immigrated to Israel from the FSU, doubling the number of physicians already in the country, Blachar said. The great majority had to be retrained to meet Israeli standards, as well as learn a new language and adjust to a new culture, but most did so successfully.

In this area, the CMA and IMA have committed themselves to working through the WMA on strategies to assess the quality of medical education and clinical knowledge of doctors from developing countries.

The health and well-being of doctors themselves is another mutual concern. The CMA and IMA may develop programs such as a telephone hotline for physicians training or working in the other country, or formulating policies aimed at protecting doctors, such as from violent patients.

They expect to collaborate on health policy issues such as the regulation of medical professionalism, and to work with the medical school deans in each country on ethics instruction.

They will work with their respective governments to "improve the lines of communication at the federal or other appropriate political level," on such issues as medical waiting times, public health and safety and inter-professionalism.

"This agreement will also provide an opportunity for ministers and others to showcase the collaboration between the two countries," the agreement states.

Under the agreement, IMA and CMA representatives will meet at least once a year, alternating between the two countries, beginning in Israel later this year or in early 2009.

Blachar, a 67-year-old pediatrician who spent a two-year fellowship at the Montreal Children's Hospital, was previously head of the WMA council for two terms.

Although Israel has one of the best ratios of doctors per population in the world, that is changing, Blachar said, and may have a shortage of doctors in the near future. Many doctors are retiring and the population continues to increase.

"Israel may soon have a ratio below the OECD average of 2.5 per 1,000 population and is already in need of anesthesiologists, critical-care specialists and general surgeons," he said.

Israelis host ceremony to remember slain Munich athletes

By ALISON KLAYMAN
JTA

BEIJING — Hundreds of Israeli, Chinese and Olympic officials gathered last week at the Hilton Beijing to commemorate the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Games.

While it has become a longstanding tradition for the Israeli delegation to visit the memorial to the Munich victims in Tel Aviv on the eve of their departure for the Olympics, the tradition to hold a formal memorial ceremony during the Games only began at Sydney in 2000.

The memorial is arranged by the Israel Olympic Committee in conjunction with the local Israeli embassy, but has never been incorporated as an official program under the International Olympic Committee (IOC), for which the Israelis have been pushing.

The secretary-general of the Israel Olympic Committee, Ephraim Zinger, opened the event by reading the names of the 11 athletes and coaches who were killed in the terrorist kidnappings in Munich. Rabbi Shimon Freudlich of Chabad Beijing led the K'El-Maleh Rachamim prayer memorializing the dead.

Fourteen members of the current Israeli delegation attended, as well as coaches and officials, all of whom had finished their competitions and were heading back to Israel the next day.

"Part of their preparation is to learn and be aware of the heritage of our 11 slain athletes," Zinger said. "All the athletes know and meet the families, and on the way to the Games they visit the memorial to the Munich victims in Tel Aviv. It is a part of their education."

Israel's minister of science, culture and sport, Raleb Majadele, spoke on behalf of the Israeli government but also recalled having lost two close friends in the massacre. He said the proper way to honour the Munich victims was "to continue to train and to continue to participate in the Olympic Games, just as we are doing here in Beijing."

Others, however, took a more critical tone.

Zvi Varshaviak, the president of the Israel Olympic Committee, called on the IOC to be involved directly in commemorating the Munich massacre. Zinger said the Israelis raise the issue at every meeting with the IOC, but without results.

"Probably they are concerned about the reaction of those who will disagree with a memorial like this," Zinger said. "There are 205 NOCs [national Olympic committees] participating in the Olympics, and there are more than a few dozen that will strongly disagree with this kind of event."

Ankie Schpitzer, whose husband, fencing referee Andrei Schpitzer, was killed in Munich, was one of the evening's most powerful speakers in advocating for a wider memorial to be witnessed by all the world's athletes.

"This is not an Israeli issue, this concerns the whole Olympic family," she said. "Our sons, fathers and husbands were no accidental tourists or visitors to the Games; they were part of it. They believed in the spirit and the dreams of the Olympics, but they all came home in a coffin."

Schpitzer graphically recalled returning to the Israeli delegation's quarters in the Munich Olympic village hours after the terrorist action ended in tragedy. She saw blood all over the room and a scene of devastation.

"And I kept repeating to myself, 'Are these the Olympics they dreamt about? Was this the festival of love and brotherhood that they wanted to be part of?'" she thought at the time.

"The overall mood of the night was that the IOC should recognize the 11 athletes who were murdered in 1972 as Olympic victims," Zinger said. "They were Israelis, yes, but they were Olympians."

Schpitzer said official recognition of the Munich massacre has been her cause since 1972, and promised that her children and grandchildren would continue to fight for official remembrance by the IOC.

Windsurfer wins Israel's first and only Beijing medal

By RAMI HIPSH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIJING — Israeli windsurfer Shahar Zubari won a bronze medal last week as he sailed his final race in the 2008 Olympic Games. It was Israel's first medal of the Beijing Games and its seventh of all time.

New Zealander Tom Ashley won the gold and France's Julien Bontemps scored the silver.

The pressure was high on Zubari, who until the final round held fourth place in the the Neil Pryde RS:X windsurfing standings.

The young man from Eilat went into the final race knowing he would have to finish at least second and also beat Bontemps by at least five boats and his other two rivals by at least four boats to walk away with anything.

After winning the medal, Zubari was inundated with phone calls – from his parents, from Israel Radio, friends, the local paper in Eilat, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and even from Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Zubari is now the pride of the Israel's Olympic delegation. With pole-vaulter Alex Averbukh failing to medal, no one was left to carry the Israeli flag at the closing ceremony. That task fell to Zubari.

Averbukh was eliminated from the Olympic Games after failing to clear 5.65 metres.

The pole vaulter had cleared 5.45 metres on his third try and declined to jump 5.55 out of strategic considerations.

Averbukh is the senior athlete in Israel's delegation. Beijing is his third Olympics – he finished in eighth place in Athens. He also holds a silver and a bronze from previous world championships as well as a European gold. However, he was sidelined by injury for quite a while and has not been impressive this year.

Only six of the other 40 competitors who participated Wednesday have topped his personal best of 5.93 meters, an Israeli national record. But, if one looks only at this year, when Averbukh barely competed, no fewer than 32 athletes vaulted higher than the 5.55 metres he accomplished two months ago.

Kashrut scandal may have silver lining

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

The Agriprocessors scandal is now more than three months old, but the story won't seem to go away.

Instead, the fallout from the May 12 raid of Agriprocessors' sprawling Postville, Iowa, slaughterhouse has only increased in the last month. The story is no longer just a case of a company flouting U.S. federal law, but also one of Jewish infighting.

New Views

First, a little background, in case you've missed the story. On May 12, immigration and customs officials in the U.S. entered the Agriprocessors plant, the largest kosher slaughterhouse in America, and arrested close to 400 illegal immigrants who were working there. In the aftermath of the federal blitz, a variety of stories regarding horrific working conditions at the plant surfaced. Some workers alleged that Agriprocessors maintained an unsanitary facility and paid employees lower-than-usual wages. Other stories told of far more dangerous working conditions, including workers carrying weapons into the plant for self-defence. According to various reports, the raid also allegedly revealed a methamphetamine laboratory at the slaughterhouse.

Much has been made of the fact that Agriprocessors is owned by a haredi family. Christian groups, human rights organizations and Conservative and liberal Orthodox Jews have all questioned whether the owner's background is somehow connected to the dirty shop he operated.

Various other religious groups – including a Roman Catholic church in Postville – have insinuated that the religiosity of the plant's owners may have been the cause of the scandal. They argue that the haredi way of life doesn't show true respect for secular laws and regulations.

A number of Jewish groups have also voiced concern and used the Agriprocessors scandal to make a number of larger, sweeping statements about Orthodox Judaism. Conservative rabbis and some liberal and modern Orthodox groups have urged their followers to boycott Agriprocessors' products, and one Conservative rabbi even voiced a concern that was similar to one raised by human rights groups operating in Postville, questioning whether haredim pay enough attention to the law of the land in their business dealings.

Mainstream Orthodox groups – including the Rabbinical Council of America, Agudath Israel, Chabad and the Orthodox Union – have responded by arguing that many allegations about Agriprocessors are untrue, and that the plant has made great strides in cleaning up its act since May 12. In a Jerusalem Post opinion piece, one Orthodox rabbi even questioned whether the raid was an anti-Semitic act.

Beyond Agriprocessors' obvious abuse of federal immigration laws in the United States, it's impossible to know yet which, if any, of the other allegations regarding Agriprocessors will in fact stick. In any case, this unfortunate story offers Jews an opportunity to consider our relationship with the larger, non-Jewish world, as well as our own intra-religious ties.

Regarding the former, the message all Jews should learn, or reaffirm, is that while our dual affiliations – to Judaism and to the state – often present difficulties, and even contradictions, we must do our utmost to adhere to both authorities. To do otherwise threatens the great peace that Jews have found in North America.

As for the duelling within Judaism that this story has kindled, there is reason to see something positive emerging from the embarrassment. Every once in a while, all large, organized groups – religious, ethnic, corporate – need to do a little investigation into their own operations and clean up the dirty, unlawful bits that may have snuck in with the largely good majority. Now is as good a time as any for Jews to look at our business practices and make sure that we are embracing human rights and best workplace practices, along with halachah.

Surely, doing so will only strengthen the health of our religion – internally, as well as in the ever-watchful eyes of the rest of the world.

Sweet Potato Salad w/ Orange-Maple Dressing

Dressing
2 tbsp pure maple syrup
2 tblsp balsamic vinegar
2 tsp minced peeled fresh ginger
1/4 tsp ground nutmeg
1/4 c extra-virgin olive oil
2 tblsp orange juice

LABOR LYCEUM BALL, 1927: The Toronto Labor Lyceum, formerly on Spadina Avenue above Dundas Street, was the home of the Jewish labour movement for many decades. Many recently arrived Jewish immigrants found jobs as tailors, cutters and machine operators in the Spadina Avenue garment industry. The Labor Lyceum helped them in their struggle for better working conditions, shorter hours and higher wages. It also hosted many social and cultural events. Memoir of small-town life

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Just like the old adage, "you don't have to be Jewish to enjoy…," author Elliot Marshall says that "you don't have to be from Cape Breton, or even from the Maritimes, to relate to the stories of small town living" in his recently published book, Once Upon a Story.

The book is the result of a lifetime of storytelling and observations of human nature, combined with a love of the written word and a dream to put the two together.

"Although I wasn't a particularly good student, I always liked English literature, stories and poetry and thought I may have a chance to put them all together some day," the Cape Breton native said.

Marshall, the youngest of 10 children, was six years old when his father died, leaving his mother to scrape by alone. He credits her tenacity and positive attitude for her successful parenting of such a large family in tiny Glace Bay, N.S.

Marshall's siblings and their life and career paths are all described in this "autobiographical collage of stories that covers 70-plus years," as noted on the book's cover.

After spending some time away at university, Marshall returned to Glace Bay to take over the family clothing store, which he operated along with his wife, Helen, for several decades. There are stories in the book about adventures in the small-town retail business, as well as vivid descriptions of some of the characters who shopped at Marshall's and anecdotes about small-town life.

There are chapters dedicated to special people that Marshall has encountered in his life, such as two young men who once worked part time in his store and were both later killed in car accidents. Another is dedicated to his friend Barry Davis, a Holocaust survivor whom Marshall met after moving to Ottawa to be near his grown children and grandchildren, while another pays tribute to Rabbi Reuven Bulka, whose synagogue, Congregation Machzikei Hadas, the Marshalls attend.

Marshall has also reproduced the eulogy he gave at the funeral of his late brother, Jack Marshall, a former Newfoundland MP and senator.

An as-yet unpublished screenplay for a proposed television show has found its way into Marshall's book, as have a number of poems he has written over the years.

"There are many chapters in my life, but what are my credentials to write a book?" Marshall asks in the introduction.

"I am not a journalist, not a preacher, not a teacher, nor am I an expert in any field; but I'm a thinker… Jewish themes and many Jewish personalities penetrate my stories. I welcome whatever feeds my curiosity. I experiment with stories, challenging and exploring life. Stories crop up when I reflect on my youth. I include relatives, old friends, old teachers from down home in Cape Breton, and famous people I admire and quote."

Anyone who hails from Cape Breton is bound to enjoy a nostalgic walk down memory lane while reading Once Upon a Story, but Marshall is correct that the book contains enough variety and vivid description of small-town life and people to entertain any reader.

Available in a few select bookstores in Ottawa, Once Upon a Story can also be purchased by contacting Elliot Marshall at elieh@sympatico.ca.

'Making the world a better place'

Making the world – and a mourner's world – better

By FRANCES KRAFT
Jewish Community Focus Editor

Last year, The CJN's Jewish Community Focus supplement looked at environmental issues. "We're thinking green," we wrote.

This year, our theme touches on environmentalism, but is broader based. Each article in this supplement focuses on ways in which members of our Jewish community – locally and farther away – are making the world, or part of it, a better place.

Editorial

Topics range from the upcoming Daniel Pearl World Music Day to ethical investing and a Mississauga woman waging her own war on litter. We also look at groups for gay youth and their parents; community inclusion for people with special needs; a guide to care of Orthodox elderly published by a grassroots social service agency in Montreal; and an organic produce program at Toronto's First Narayever Congregation.

There's a reflection on a Birthright Israel trip that brought together youth from the deaf and hearing communities, and an article on a Uganda kindergarten started by Israeli volunteers and headed by a Muslim woman.

Israel's Yatir Winery, the subject of another article in the supplement, donates its tree trimmings to Palestinians who use them as kindling, but the focus of our story is its award-winning wines. Sometimes making the world a better place is as simple – or as complex – as well-prepared food and drink.

On a personal note, I spent much time thinking about ways that people made my world a bit better during the week of shivah that followed my father's death in early July.

Three years ago, I wrote an article on shivah protocol. I considered myself fairly well informed on the subject, but experience is a powerful teacher.

Small acts of kindness can have a big impact

Among the lessons I learned:

• Online messages to the bereaved family are not redundant, even if you know you will be expressing your condolences personally within the next few days. For my family, those postings – particularly before the funeral – served as a link to the outside world and a reminder that our support network was starting to kick in.

• Affectionate laughter and shared memories are good medicine. Nourishing food helps, too.

• Small acts of kindness can have a big impact.

• Support can come from unexpected places.

• Mealtimes are tricky. Ideally, visitors should not arrive at mealtimes, but sometimes they do. Or they may arrive later and find that some mourners – like me – are slow eaters, or eat at odd hours on days when they need rest more than food.

Mealtime is a time to be particularly sensitive to mourners' needs. It may be the only time they have to be alone, and they may be involved in intense discussion. There's a lot to process during a shivah.

On the other hand, mourners may welcome the opportunity to have some quiet time with the visitors and invite them to the table so that they will not feel they have to rush to finish eating.

• Coping with grief is universal and, at the same time, very individual. Respect the mourners' needs, even if you don't understand them.

• Don't tell a mourner what to expect or that you know how he or she feels. If you're wrong, it can be alienating instead of comforting. Alternatives are: "Some people find that…"; "You might find that…"; or "I found that…"

• Although the focus of the shivah is on the family and its loss, I found it unexpectedly comforting when people told me – briefly – about their own losses. A sentence or two often provided perspective on our own situation and opened a door for us to ask questions or do a reality check. It helps to know that others have gone through the same experience.

First Narayever Congregation supports organic farm

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

The little tent outside the First Narayever Congregation's synagogue is bursting with customers.

People walk by the boxes of organic vegetables, stopping to chat every few minutes while filling bags with potatoes, cucumbers and chard.

Children cling to their grandparents, hypnotized by a swinging cabbage that has been attached to a backpack string.

"Mommy doesn't like broccoli," one child shouts as she weaves through the crowd.

"What about this," her grandmother asks, holding up a head of crisp, green lettuce, which gets a curt nod of approval.

"It's the week to get peas, for sure," someone announces as hands reach for the box of peas.

This is the scene every Thursday from 4 to 7:30 p.m., when First Narayever, located near Brunswick Avenue and Bloor Street, hosts its community-supported agriculture program (CSA). In conjunction with Tuv Ha'Aretz, a network of Jewish CSAs managed by Hazon, a New York-based Jewish environmental organization, the synagogue sells shares for the annual harvest at Everdale farm. Each share is worth a certain number of points, which can be used to purchase produce from the Everdale tent outside the synagogue.

The program is meant to connect the Jewish community to the food they eat as well as to themselves.

"The goal is to simultaneously raise people's consciousness about food issues in general and to make connections to Jewish ethics," said Andrea Most, the site co-ordinator for Narayever's Tuv Ha'Aretz CSA.

In addition, she said, "it's a Jewish value to bring the community together around food," Most said.

"There's a sense of community. First of all, the farmers themselves are here at the table. Relationships develop. People are schmoozing, there are lots of people from the neighbourhood as well. It connects them to their surroundings.

"There's a lot of Jewish text about our stewardship of the earth. This seems to me like an ideal way to express that responsibility. If you're eating stuff with chemicals and pollutants, it doesn't seem like a good expression of [that value.]"

First Narayever chose to work with Everdale because of the farm's experience with a similar shareholder program.

Narayever community 'knows where the food comes from'

The farm has 150 acres of certified organic land, 15 acres of which is devoted to vegetables. Everdale sells locally as well as in urban areas. It also holds hands-on workshops and other educational programs to help connect people to the food they eat.

Carl Leslie, the crop manager at Everdale farm, said the Narayever program was a way for the community to get to know the farm.

"People get to know where the food comes from. They develop a relationship with the seasons and a connection to the environment," he said.

The project also helps support local produce.

"There's major industrialization of agriculture – it's making it difficult to compete," Leslie said. "[The program] helps by allowing us to sell at a rate that allows us to survive."

ASL/Spoken English Birthright trip inspires changes

By RYAN KRAFT
Special to The CJN

I always wondered what going to Israel on a Birthright program would mean to me. Although I had travelled to Israel in 2000 with March of the Living, I didn't feel a connection to the country.

I knew then that if I went back to Israel, I wanted it to be with a distinct community that was unique within the Jewish community – that maybe going on a special program would shift my experience and make me understand why so many people feel the country is home.

Most people are surprised when I tell them that I chose to go on a bilingual Birthright Israel bus, where the two languages used were American Sign Language (ASL) and spoken English.

I am hearing, and had only taken courses in ASL for a year to help me communicate with a friend of mine. Going as part of the bilingual group fulfilled my desire to connect with Israel as part of a unique community, and it happened to be a group in which I knew some of the other participants from other conferences I had attended.

I was a bit intimidated when I met up with my Birthright group at JFK airport in New York. I hadn't had much opportunity to practice my ASL and couldn't sign much beyond basic conversation and the alphabet.

The first couple of days together were a bit of a challenge, but with laughter, patience and a lot of effort, I began learning enough ASL to communicate and have lengthy discussions with my new friends.

Kaddish in sign language is 'emotionally powerful'

When I think back on my experience – climbing Masada for the first time to watch the sunrise, feeling the heat of the sun when hiking Ein Gedi, and floating down the Jordan River with my group – it's hard to believe that I did not extend my trip. I had the time of my life, and all I wanted was to stay longer.

During the trip, we were joined by seven Israelis, five of whom were deaf or hard of hearing, and their Israeli Sign Language interpreter.

Four of the Israelis are soldiers in the Israeli army, a service they volunteered for. Having them with us opened up a whole new dimension of communication. It was interesting for me to see how similar Israeli Sign Language is to ASL, and how the Israelis fit in so quickly with us, even with the language barriers.

One of the most touching moments of the trip took place during our visit to the military cemetery on Mount Herzl. The Israeli soldiers led our group in the Mourner's Kaddish in Israeli Sign Language, and all of us signed along with them. I have a video of it, and it still brings tears to my eyes. Seeing something so emotionally powerful communicated in sign has always moved me.

Participants receive Hebrew names — and a 'sign name'

On the one Shabbat we spent in Israel, we had both bar/bat mitzvah and Hebrew naming ceremonies. Hearing and seeing how my friends chose their Hebrew names – and why – was beautiful, and reflected how much the trip had affected them.

On the airplane home, while talking to two of my friends, they found out I didn't have a sign name and decided to give me one. A sign name is traditionally given to you by a deaf person based on a personality trait or physical feature, like being energetic, curly-haired or smiley.

My sign name is the ASL letter "R," with the person's hand moving upwards past his or her head. My friends gave me this name because it mimics the sign for "tall."

It feels a little bit strange to have connected with Israel now, at the age of 25. Most of my friends from the trip are much younger, and they connected with the land earlier.

Ryan Kraft and Rachel Kirschner ride a camel as part of their Birthright Israel trip.

I remember sitting on our bus heading toward a kibbutz in the north, talking to Noga, our Israeli interpreter, about what was going through my mind at that point.

I had told her that I didn't want my experience to end – that I wanted to find some way to carry it forward, and to make really significant changes in my life. She suggested that I make three changes, because any more than that would be difficult to implement.

The trip has left a lasting impression on me. I've applied to study American Sign Language at college next year. I am moving back to Toronto, the city I grew up in. And I am also making an effort to get involved in Birthright alumni programming, going on more trips so that I can extend my experience and keep this feeling alive inside of me.

It's hard to put into words, but its something akin to realizing who you are and understanding that it's important to follow your heart.

Notes for hearing people

Before I left on this trip, I was given a few pointers on how to interact with people in the deaf community, because there are sometimes cross-cultural misunderstandings.

- Remember that people who use ASL may sound blunt to hearing people, because ideas are expressed more directly in ASL than in English.
- Keep an open mind when trying to communicate. On the trip, we invented signs or wrote things down on paper when interpreters were not available.
- American Sign Language is a distinct language. It's not the same as English, nor does it have the same grammar or sentence structure. All sign languages are as distinct as spoken languages are.
- Always speak directly to people who are deaf, even if someone is interpreting for them.
- Last, but not least, be willing to learn!

'A community is not whole unless it is inclusive'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Stanley Kugelmass, a local lawyer whose 25-year-old daughter has developmental disabilities, says that an inclusive community must remove physical as well as psychological barriers.

But Kugelmass, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's inclusion task force, said that attitudes are often harder to change than physical barriers.

"The psychological barriers that do exist are not based on ill will. It is a matter of indifference or a missed opportunity. When someone is in a wheelchair, it's difficult to open a door. Stand by for a moment, and open the door for him. We should do that without thinking."

It's to everyone's benefit to include those who may be "different," Kugelmass said, but many people haven't been touched by the issue.

"Sooner or later, every one of us is going to be disabled. This is about all of us."

The goal of the task force, formed after a 2002 retreat to discuss students with special needs in the Jewish educational system, is to change attitudes and create action, he said.

"We look at what resources are available for special needs, and how we can improve."

Fay Rotman, the director and only paid staff member of the task force, said it looks at the broader picture, including those with physical and developmental disabilities, as well as those with visual and sensory issues, and seniors.

"We are focusing on getting synagogues to be open and welcoming. We've met with synagogue executive directors, and now we're meeting with the presidents to discuss what they can do to make their synagogues more inclusive, such as sensitizing ushers on how to respond to people with disabilities."

The task force is also looking at youth groups, summer camps and even Birthright Israel, and it's planning an inclusive action week this coming winter, Rotman said.

"We want to give these groups the tools to create their own ideas."

The task force's first event, held last February, was an awards event in which they gave out community inclusive awards of excellence, and it plans to include another awards evening during an upcoming "inclusion week," she said.

The week, whose date has yet to be announced, will kick off with a screening of the film Praying with Lior, a Jewish Film Festival film about a young boy with Downs syndrome.

"We're going to end the week with a Shabbat across the GTA. Synagogues will participate by hosting programs or giving sermons. Something will be done at every synagogue."

Myra Wiener was chair of planning of the recent Kinus 2008, a conference for developmental service providers, supported by Reena, UJA Federation, Ottawa's Tamir Foundation, Jewish Federation of Ottawa and Bert and Marilyn Raphael Advocacy Fund.

Rotman stressed that inclusion is not something you do for someone, but rather is something that strengthens the entire community.

"It is not a service – it is a concept. A community is not whole unless it is inclusive. It is necessary, not only for those with special needs, but for the health of the community," she said.

"Everyone needs to feel that they can play a role in the community. For people with developmental disabilities and their families, it means having programs specific to their needs. Families must feel included. The Jewish community needs a big umbrella."

The Reena choir performed at the opening of fourth biannual Kinus conference in Toronto. Playing piano is choir master Fern Dworkin.

Wiener said that agencies such as Reena are essential, "but the community has not done its bit by having Reena. We have to make an effort to be inclusive in all aspects of communal life, and it can go two ways. Able people need to be part of the programming."

Remove barriers to people with special needs, advocates say

Arlene Margolese, manager of volunteer services and faith and cultural services at Reena, said individuals shouldn't feel that they are doing something "wonderful" by including people with special needs.

"They should easily accept everyone with all the gifts they bring," Margolese said. "The inclusion committee can help with the educational process. People may have good intentions, but they don't know what to do."

She said Reena reaches out to Jews living outside the Jewish community in order to provide them with Jewish programming. "Our goal is for those who live within a non-Jewish agency to have a Jewish identity and the opportunity to live a Jewish life."

'A great opportunity to eat local'

Organic and local farms like Everdale offer consumers something large farms can't offer, Leslie added. "The majority of agriculture [companies] can't provide a relationship with the farm. That's what we're selling, as much as we're selling food."

The response from the community has been positive.

"The interest is so huge. [Last year] we had 60 members by the end of the season. This year we have [around] 100," Most said.

Ali Aber, a member of the congregation, enjoys the chance to connect with the local farms.

"I thought it was a great opportunity to eat local and be part of the community," she said. "You come down here to pick up groceries, you get to schmooze. You know exactly where [the food] is coming from and how it's grown."

Accessibility about 'understanding barriers'

Speaking at Kinus 2008, Shelly Christensen, inclusion manager of the Jewish Community Inclusion Program for People with Disabilities in Minneapolis, Minn., said the religious community has tremendous opportunities to help people with disabilities.

"Making institutions accessible is less about budgets than about understanding barriers. Changes occur when leaders have a positive attitude. [You cannot] let people in the door and then ignore them," said Christensen, author of the Jewish Community Guide to Inclusion of People with Disabilities.

Marilyn Raphael's daughter Sheree, 52, has cerebral palsy and developmental delays. She lives semi-independently – a worker comes in regularly – in a Reena-sponsored group home with two other women.

"They do their own shopping and banking. When [Sheree] goes to the bank, they help her out. She also takes the bus to her job at a sheltered workshop."

Raphael, a Reena board member, said, however, that although her daughter has every opportunity to do what she is able to do, "we cannot make people like her. Rules can be enforced so that everyone has rights, but you cannot make people embrace those who have differences."

Raphael said when Sheree was young, there were no facilities for her. "She went to nursery school until she was eight years old, and then we were told that our only option was to take her to an institution."

Sheree lived at the Huronia Regional Centre in Orillia, said Raphael, "and they were very kind. We visited her every week. But then Reena opened its first group home, and the rest is history. She grew and flourished into a sweet and charming young woman."

Moms start lootbag collection program for SickKids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Bonnie Gremont, Samantha Rakusin and Alysse Unger-Luepann have started a lootbag collection program for patients at the Hospital for Sick Children.

The three women are mothers of students at Leo Baeck Day School, and Gremont also teaches junior kindergarten at the school's Thornhill branch.

They hope the program, which they are calling Lootbags of Love, will catch on at other schools or workplaces, Gremont told The CJN. "The hope is that in the future, any time somebody makes a party, they would think of us and make an extra lootbag."

Gremont said that the hospital gets most of its corporate donations at Christmastime, and that by May – when Lootbags for Love had its initial drive and collected more than 500 lootbags and toys – SickKids' "treasure chests" were closer to empty.

Inclusion at synagogues and in Jewish world

Marilyn Raphael, mother of Sheree, 52, who has cerebral palsy and is developmentally delayed, offers the following suggestions for a more inclusive Jewish community:

- When a person with a disability comes to a service, welcome them and lead them to the front. Invite them to sit with you at the kiddush lunch, or even to your seder. "When someone makes the choice of stepping out of their own world, they should feel welcomed in the wider world. We were all taught to walk in the sunshine, not hide inside."
- Rabbis should talk about Reena during their sermons, ushers should be sensitized, and synagogues should start their own inclusion committees.
- Jewish nursing homes need to have provisions for seniors who are developmentally delayed.

Shelly Christensen, manager of the Minneapolis Jewish Community Inclusion Program for People with Disabilities, offers these suggestions:

- Staff and clergy from every synagogue need disability awareness training, and just like every other committee, someone has to be responsible for inclusion. "One synagogue told me that their ushers don't know where to find large print prayer books or the listening devices."
- Families of people with disabilities need to be prepared when entering an inclusive environment. They should not walk in and just expect to be included. It is not a one-way street. They should be ready to be a part of the community.

Myra Wiener, chair of planning for Kinus 2008, says:

- Synagogues need programs specific to the needs of all their members.
- Inclusion can go two ways. Those of us who are abled should join the activities of those are are disabled.

Campers gain confidence from Shakespeare

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

For most of the campers at Marvin Karon's day camp, Shakespeare used to be indecipherable. Mere weeks ago, Hamlet was just another unit in school and Nick Bottom was nothing more than an unfortunate nickname. But now, after four weeks at the Shakespearience Summer Experience, the magic of Shakespeare has come to life.

"I really like Shakespeare," said Sarah-Anne Seale, 15, one of the campers at Shakespearience. "At first it was over my head, but now I can make more sense of it."

The Shakespearience Summer Experience is a free day camp for students in grades 7 to 9. Many of the participants of the camp are at-risk youth in lower income families.

Karon is an actor and certified teacher, and the camp's executive director. The camp, started in 2005, is part of Shakespearience, founded in 1998 by Karon and actor R.H. Thomson. Shakespearience provides in-school and after-school Shakespeare workshops.

Campers at the Shakespearience Summer Experience train for four weeks with professional actors and teachers

Shakespearience started off as a 20-school pilot program and has grown to include over 100 schools in the Greater Toronto Area.

Ten years ago, when Karon, who trained at the National Theatre School of Canada, was between acting jobs, he began supply teaching.

"I got stuck at a school. While there, I was teaching Macbeth to a Grade 12 class," he said. "What made me want to [start Shakespearience] is seeing kids so turned off and hostile to Shakespeare because it's tackled academically."

During the summer, Karon, along with a group of actors and teachers, helped about 25 to 30 students act out a set of scenes from various Shakespeare plays. This year, the camp was held at Wexford Collegiate School for the Arts and ended on July 31 with a performance at the Canadian Stage Company (CanStage). This is the first year that Shakespearience joined forces with Canstage.

Marvin Karon, left, started Shakespearience in 1998 to help students embrace Shakespeare.

Understanding Shakespeare's work can be difficult. "It's Elizabethan, it's old. [Shakespeare's] thoughts are complex and intricate. It's difficult for kids whose critical thinking skills are not far developed," Karon said.

He takes it one step at a time.

"The way we get them there is trial and error. It's slow and painstaking. We're breaking it down word by word. All language is so passionate, you have to play into that. It takes commitment and fearlessness. We're getting them to let go and to savour language," he said.

To Seale, a student who would have spent her summer on the couch if not for this program, Shakespeare is more than just words.

"Once you get past the weird words, the stories are amazing, everything is connected," she said. "It's more fun here. In class, we have to read it, we don't get as much. Here we act it out, it's easier to understand."

For Maggie Huculak, an actress, teacher and staff member at the day camp, teaching Shakespeare is about acting, not reading.

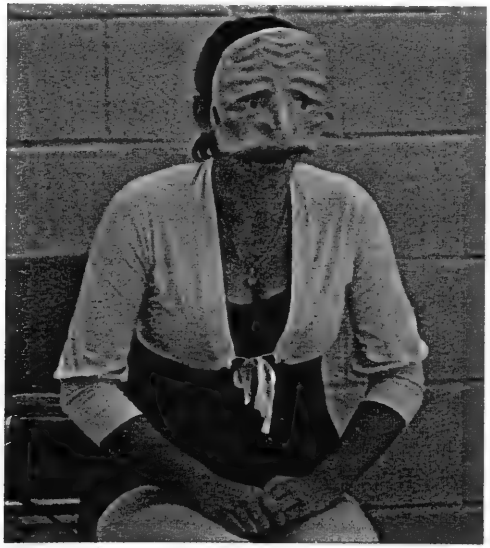
"Some students were unable to read the text out loud, they couldn't bring sense to the text. Through rehearsal, we illuminate the meaning," she said. "It livens their experience from the neck down. A human is body and soul. Too often we're dealing with humans from the neck up. Their tools to create get rusty. Children are fundamentally creative beings, but by the end of Grade 12 part of them is languishing. They become memory experts."

The ability to master Shakespeare provides both knowledge and confidence.

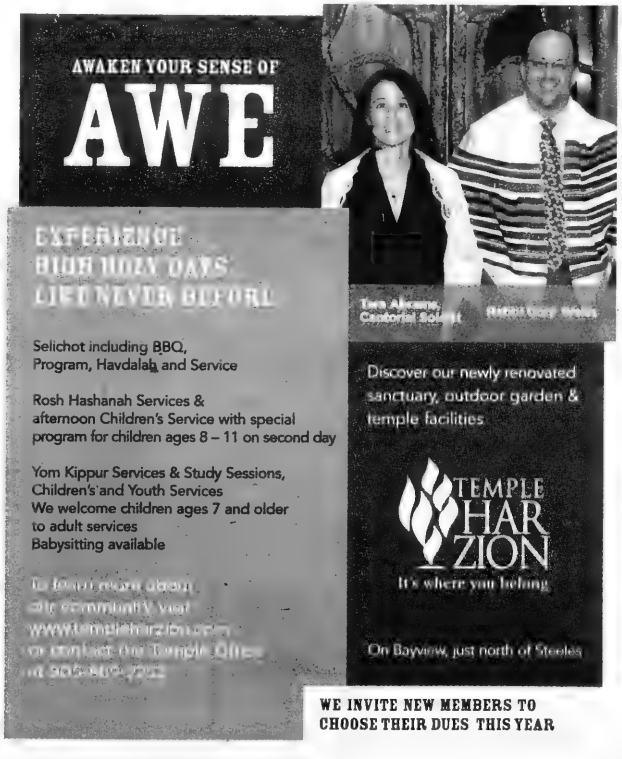
"We can offer a safe and beautiful environment for young people to explore some of the toughest language in the canon of all literature. Their pursuit of that is a great gift to self-esteem and a sense of accomplishment," Huculak said.

Karon agreed.

"[The] language is such an obstacle, it's a hurdle. When they start to understand, they think, 'I must be smarter than I thought.' I hope subliminally they learn that if you want something, you've got to work for it," he said.



Shakespearience summer experience, a free day camp, helps campers understand Shakespeare's plays through acting and step-by-step discussions.



Institute celebrates 20 years of defending Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — "If you ask me what I'm most proud of after 20 years, it's that we have survived," says Frederick Krantz, founder and director of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), an independent, pro-Israel, largely voluntary foundation.

CIJR, which is guided by academics but geared to the needs of the community's grassroots, publishes the daily ISRANET Briefing and the biweekly Israzine, among other online and print English and French publications intended to disseminate accurate information and fair comment about the Middle East and Jewish issues. It also maintains a huge physical and online archive of articles and papers on the same topics and runs programs for university students, including training in how to advocate for Israel on campus.

Krantz is proud of the fact that CIJR is able to do so much with a small staff and a very tight budget. The institute has just two year-round staff members headed by Jacqueline Douek, three student interns (two of whom are working only through the summer), and an archivist, a six-month position made possible by a Quebec government grant.

Otherwise, CIJR relies almost entirely on funding from individuals, and that amounts to just enough to get by annually, Krantz said. It receives no money from the organized Jewish community, a circumstance that Krantz still doesn't understand after two decades.

"What we are doing is unique in Canada. We are recognized internationally, but still there is no support."

CIJR celebrates its 20th anniversary with a formal gala dinner – the first in its history – Aug. 27 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim at 6 p.m. The honorees are veteran international Jewish leader Isi Leibler and his wife Naomi Leibler, world president of Emunah, and Alan Baker, who is shortly leaving his position as Israeli ambassador to Canada after four years. They will receive CIJR's Lion of Judah award.

Theo Caldwell, president of Caldwell Asset Management Inc. and a current affairs columnist for the National Post and Toronto Sun, who has frequently defended Israel, will be recognized as CIJR's Golden Magen David honoree for outstanding person of the year.

Isi Leibler is a former senior leader of World Jewish Congress who was forced to leave the organization a few years ago, when he called for an investigation into alleged financial irregularities that eventually proved to be justified. The billionaire Australian businessman and prolific writer now lives in Israel, where he chairs the Israel-Diaspora committee of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs.

Krantz, a New York-born, Concordia University professor of the history of the Renaissance, who spends more time in Italy than in Israel, did not set out to create a think-tank or a lobby group.

But he was incensed by what he saw as biased media coverage against Israel during the first intifadah in the late '80s. He was convinced that the Arabs were waging a campaign to divide Diaspora Jewry and that the community needed to put up a united public front. Krantz felt that leadership was not coming from the organized Jewish community.

He started to write letters and articles to the Gazette and other papers. He noticed some fellow academics, notably Harold Waller and Julien Bauer, were taking similar action, and suggested they co-ordinate their activities.

Soon, the professors were being invited to speak at synagogues and community groups, and Krantz became aware of the hunger for information in the Jewish community about what was going on in the Middle East.

The professors launched a daily newsletter call Responsa, which was sent by fax connected to a computer, the leading technology of the day.

"We spent $800 on that machine, which was a lot of money at the time," Krantz recalled. For the first couple of years, CIJR operated out of Krantz's basement as a volunteer effort. Responsa soon became Israfax, which continues to be published today as a quarterly digest.

One of the first non-academics attracted to CIJR was Baruch Cohen, who at 88, continues to come into work as the organization's volunteer research chair. The Romanian-born Holocaust survivor saw in CIJR a means of concretely expressing his passionate devotion to the continuity of the Jewish people.

"CIJR is a gem," he said. "A powerful voice against 'shtadlanut' [appeasement], an uncompromising defender of the rights of the Jewish people and the rights of the State of Israel. CIJR plays an essential role on the international political landscape by offering consistent, valuable and clear analysis of the Jewish world, the Middle East and Israel."

Cohen and Krantz found each other after a letter by the former was published in The Canadian Jewish News in August 1988, expressing his concerns about a federal government-sponsored symposium that brought together a select group of Arab and Jewish Canadians at Montebello, Que. Krantz also opposed the clandestine meeting.

The CIJR's first "office" was a room at the Canadian Zionist Federation's headquarters, then on Décarie Boulevard. "I chain-smoked a pipe at that time, and Baruch threatened to leave if I didn't quit. I said I need nicotine to write, but I did quit. Baruch was just too valuable to us," Krantz said.

Although his personal views are hawkish, Krantz has always insisted that CIJR be open to a broad spectrum of opinion on Israel, but he draws the line at Peace Now, whose open criticism, he feels, is detrimental.

"Jewish unity has always been our key value. And that means not criticizing Israel publicly. Internal debate in the community is all right, but we should not be publicly questioning the legitimacy of its democratically elected government," Krantz said.

Ethical investing grows in popularity

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It wasn't that long ago when tailoring financial investments to conform to an investor's ethics was an idea that came from way out in left field.

Total return was the much more important factor, and who cared if a company made its money selling cigarettes, operating casinos or marketing weapons to dictators who used them against their own people.

Turns out a lot of people do care and that number is growing. Today, there are dozens of funds that cater to investors' social concerns, providing the opportunity to invest and make money with a clean conscience. According to SIO, the Social Investment Organization, "assets invested according to socially responsible guidelines" have grown enormously in recent years. In 2006, such assets stood at $503.6 billion, up from $65.5 billion two years before.

"The vast majority of this increase is due to the recent adoption of socially responsible investment practices by several major pension funds, mostly in the public sector," states the SIO's Canadian Socially Responsible Investment Review 2006, the most recent investigation of the subject.

"In Canada, the socially responsible investor can chose from over 70 mutual funds in a variety of asset classes: global/international equity, Canadian equity, fixed income, money market, Canadian balanced and Canadian dividend. There is one exchange-traded fund, iShares Canadian Jantzi Social Index Fund," states economist and investment writer Larry MacDonald.

David Nitkin

Conspicuous by its absence is a fund based on Jewish ethics. Nevertheless, Jewish investors are flocking to ethical funds and are seeking advice on corporate practices, said David Nitkin, president of EthicScan Canada, a firm that compiles data on corporations for socially responsible investors.

His clients include both institutional and retail investors, along with many non-Jewish institutions, among them churches. They are seeking the kind of information that will direct their investments, including the identity of companies that participate in the boycott of Israel, or have decided to divest from Israeli holdings or whose CEOs have produced literature hostile to the Jewish state.

EthicScan, which employs some 317 different measures when studying investment opportunities, prepares reports by applying filters suitable for clients' particular investment criteria, Nitkin said.

While investing in Israel is important for some, other Jewish institutions seek advice on different grounds, such as companies' management policies, their codes of ethics, and their lending practices.

Some investors are concerned about the environment, sustainable development, health and safety practices and even the hiring of Jews.

One Jewish institutional investor queried the company about governance issues, another on how to make their facility "green."

Jews are increasingly concerned about investments that comport with their "Jewish values," Nitkin said. This stems from the perspective "that the world belongs to God and what you earn is yours but stems from God," he said. Moreover, "hard work is required in order to profit."

People today "have a stronger sense of the fragility of the planet," he continued, "and people are conscious of the longer term implications of investing."

The first big shift in ethical investing took place about 20 years ago. Companies that did business with South Africa entered into investors' bad books and a whole new area of investing developed, one that placed a greater emphasis on where the money was invested, keeping in mind a desire for good returns.

Since the late 1980s, many investors have expressed concerns over a number of issues that have entered into their investment calculations, Nitkin said. Since 1988, when he identified South Africa as a major investment issue, Nitkin has been re-examining ethical concerns every four years. Based on interviews with corporation executives, business ethics teachers, journalists and advocates, he found the areas of concern shifted. In 1992, it was the environment; in 1996, questions of diversity and equity (women and minorities in the workplace) predominated; in 2000, investors were concerned over child labour and in 2004, security and privacy concerns were dominant.

While his studies did not focus on Jewish investors per se, there is evidence that Jews, too, are concerned about more than return when investing.

A six-year-old study of Jewish sources behind ethical investing – including the Torah, Mishnah and responsa – found that Jews have always considered the ethics behind commercial activities regardless of the prevalent economic system in place.

'We need a product to reflect our values'

In Capital Markets and Jewish Teachings, authors Mark Schwartz, Meir Tamari and Daniel Schwab found that "Judaism and its ancient sources do provide ample basis for the principles under which a Jewish-based ethical fund could be established for operation in today's capital markets. Such a fund would maintain a unique perspective on minority shareholders, and the general principles of this fund could be categorized under seven headings: abiding by Jewish law; abetting; justice and goodness; abiding by contracts; preserving life; settlement of the world; and Sabbath, festivals and kosher food."

The authors noted that Jews are expected to devote part of their money to charity and provide for the welfare of the poor and weak. "At the same time, care had to be taken so that one's property did not injure the property, health and even esthetic satisfaction of other people. Parallel to these obligations is the insistence on the fulfilment of contracts and fiduciary obligations that require that other people's funds given to one for investment or safe guarding be subject to Judaism's moral and ethical teachings and obligations."

The report found that ethical principles had been implemented in Christian and Muslim ethical funds, but "a Jewish-based ethical fund is sorely lacking."

A Canadian attempt at serving that market niche was launched recently by Jantzi Research, a Toronto-based firm that evaluates and monitors the social and environmental performance of securities. The company operates a Canadian social investment database that analyzes 300 companies and trusts, and it offers an exchange-traded fund based on socially responsible criteria, iShares Canadian Jantzi Social Index Fund.

It recently announced plans to launch the Maimonides Global Equity Fund as an investment vehicle that would integrate "social and environmental analyses based on Jewish principles."

A Jantzi news release stated the fund would be "based on Jewish principles, including tzedakah – justice and goodness, pikuach nefesh – the preservation of life; yishuv haolam – the settlement of the world; lo tashchit – prohibition against the wanton destruction of nature."

Despite its lofty ideals, the fund failed to gain traction within the Jewish community – at least among institutions and high-worth investors.

Paula Glick, director of sales and marketing for Jantzi, said the fund needs only $5 million to get off the ground, but so far wealthy investors and institutions have not been forthcoming. "No one wants to be the first one in," she said.

Paula Glick

Smaller scale retail investors have expressed an interest in the product, but a critical mass has to first be attained before marketing it to the public, she said.

Jantzi has seen various religious denominations line up behind products tailored specifically for their needs, whether Muslims or Christian groups. That's a growing trend in the industry.

"In general, a lot of people want to disconnect how they make their money with how they live their lives. But a lot of people do care, and want to see consistency and have their investments reflect their values," she said.

"People can invest and get a competitive return, and feel good knowing that the companies [they've invested in] are doing good.

"We need a Jewish product," she continued. "There isn't such a thing at the present time, and we need a product to reflect our values and the values we were brought up with."

Filters designed for the fund would have limited investments to companies that practise good corporate governance, treat employees well, are involved in sustainable activities and are environmentally conscious. The fund would avoid investing in state enterprises of countries that do not recognize Israel, she added. And a high percentage of the fund would invest in Israeli corporations.

There is currently one mutual fund – the Amidex35 Israel Mutual Fund – which tracks the AMIDEX35 index and invests in the 35 largest market capitalization Israeli companies, publicly traded on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange or on Wall Street. "Many of the larger Israeli companies are growth companies that have a strong technology orientation," states the Amidex website.

However, Amidex cautions investors: "The fund is not diversified… The relatively limited liquidity of some of the equities in the portfolio may affect the fund's ability to acquire desired positions quickly or dispose of securities at a desirable price and time."

Ethics screens include materials, oil companies

Longtime business writer Gordon Pape cautions investors to look closely at the screens employed to create socially responsible funds. Some include banks, others do not; big oil companies can make it into some funds while they're excluded in others.

• "Over the three years to May 31 the Ethical Growth Fund posted an average annual compound rate of return of 12.7 per cent, well ahead of the category average," Pape reports. Interestingly, the fund includes commodity stocks – energy and materials sectors make up about one-third of the portfolio – with major holdings, including Suncor, Nexen and EnCana.

• Economist and writer Larry MacDonald notes that "the largest single fund is the Investors Group SRI Summa Fund, with over $1.5 billion in assets, followed by Ethical Growth Fund at $385 million and Ethical Balanced Fund at $360 million. The oldest ethical mutual fund in Canada is the Ethical Growth Fund, birthed in 1987."

• The Ethical Funds Company operates a stock index, a group of securities that represents all or a portion of a stock market, against which the performance of mutual funds and individual securities can be measured.

• The Company touts it as "the only broad based index of Canadian public companies that is screened for environmental, social and governance practices (ESG)." It uses the market-encompassing S&P/TSX Composite Index of Canadian stocks as its base before screening out companies on the basis of their ESG.

• As of June 30, 2008, the Ethical Canadian Index's total return over five years was 17.5 per cent, compared to 19.2 per cent registered by the TSX 60's total return (for large cap stocks) and 18.1 per cent over the broader S&P/TSX Composite Index.

• Looking back three years, the Ethical Index returned 15.9 per cent, the TSX 60 18.2 per cent and the Composite Index, 16.1 per cent.

• The one-year return for the Ethical Canadian Index stood at 7.6 per cent, versus 10.4 for the TSX 60 and 6.8 per cent for the Composite Index.

Israel's light shines in Uganda

By JONATHAN PULIK
JTA

Bleak and dusty, the Namuwongo slum in Kampala, Uganda stretches along the main rail line that runs through this capital city.

Shantytown dwellers who use the tracks as a pedestrian thoroughfare are killed or maimed regularly by passing trains.

Yards away, among the wooden shacks, stand the bamboo walls of a kindergarten for some of the slum's neediest children.

Started last year by an oncology intern from Tel Aviv who was volunteering in Uganda with the Israel-based humanitarian aid organization Brit Olam, the Little Light Children's Centre is filled with AIDS orphans, children who are disabled and disfigured, and regular kids from the slums.

Muslim woman runs kindergarten started by Tel Aviv doctor

"We decided to invest in young children with no place to go, nourish them and prepare them for school," says the physician Shiri Tenenboim, who has since returned to Israel. She helps manage the school's administration and fundraising efforts from Tel Aviv.

Children come to Little Light from as far away as neighbouring Congo, where a savage war turned them and their families into refugees. One girl's face is scarred permanently by burns from a falling candle that set her bed alight as she slept. Fewer than 10 per cent of Ugandans have electricity at home.

Five days a week, about 60 children aged three to seven eat a nutritious breakfast and learn from teachers who are trained with funds raised in Israel. The money comes from donations made by Israeli companies and funds raised by the sale in Israel of bead necklaces made in Uganda.

Along with a steady stream of Israeli volunteers, the kindergarten is run by Qasasa Ayeha, a resident of the slum, a devout Muslim and a die-hard fan of Israel's Maccabi Haifa soccer club.

Not yet a formally qualified teacher, Qasasa is in the midst of two years of training – paid for with Israeli donations. She says the experience has changed her view of Israelis.

"I had never met Israelis before," she says. "I knew them as inflexible and sophisticated weapon makers. After seeing the film about the storming of Entebbe, I thought they had supernatural powers!"

For their part, the Israeli volunteers say that what impresses them about Qasasa is her "innate wisdom" and versatility. Qasasa even improvised a religion-neutral grace before meals that works for both the kindergarten's Christian and Muslim children. In Uganda, prayer is a fixture in most schools and in the workplace.

On a weekend outing to the Entebbe botanical garden some 20 miles from Kampala, Qasasa stands at the ready with her first-aid kit, nursing scrapes and mosquito bites almost before they happen. For some of the children, it is their first ride in a car. One toddler becomes motion sick, vomiting on her Sunday best.

Later, playing soccer with the children, Qasasa's flowing black abaya doesn't stop her from diving to the ground to make a save.

"The kids really change when they come to the school," she says. "Some used to buy alcohol. Now it's sweets. I give them basic knowledge, and they take it higher."

Until Little Light was established, many of the children who attend the kindergarten spent their days picking through the mountains of trash that litter the slum. Searching for scrap metal, bottles and other valuables, they'd sell their findings for a few cents to feed themselves and their families.

"'They had nails like talons to scavenge," Qasasa says.

In the school's early days, heavy rains would turn its dirt floor into a muddy quagmire. Then an Israeli construction firm in Kampala poured a concrete floor here free of charge.

Mercy Annet, whose three-year-old son Kinene Ramson attends the preschool, says the school has helped make Kinene healthy and strong.

"They care so much for the kids," Annet says. "'They give him milk, which we can't afford."

Tenenboim says eventually the school will be part of a comprehensive, community-run centre that will also host older children and evening parenting classes. It just may take a little time.

"It's the difficult things that we do quickly – the impossible takes a little longer," she says, quoting the late Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion.

"Israel is now a flourishing country, an example to struggling ones like Uganda. I see international aid as the new Zionism," Tenenboim says. "We did it ourselves with the help of the international com-

Reaching out to Jewish gay youth

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jewish gay community in Toronto is becoming more visible and vocal, and Jewish service providers are doing what they can to reach them.

Richard Cummings, the executive director of Jewish Family and Child (JF&C) Toronto, said that when JF&C was approached by members of the Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered community (LGBT), it listened.

There was no outlet for adolescents

"One of the consistent comments was that there wasn't an outlet during their adolescence for discussing and dealing with gaining a sense of mutuality in terms of the challenges of growing up," Cummings said.

Together, they came up with an idea to create student groups for Jewish gay teens at York Region high schools, as well as the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto campuses.

In April, JF&C, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and United Way worked to sponsor a free discussion for Jewish gay high school students to talk about what it's like to be gay in the Jewish community.

"We had co-operation from schools when this was posed as an opportunity, but we really didn't have any expressions of interest. We did not get enough student response to proceed, but we will try again," Cummings said.

"Although there wasn't necessarily interest for this kind of a group, that by no means suggests that we are abandoning the notion of being available, which we are, to all members of the community, and more specifically, developing support that might address the particular circumstances and issues that might be encountered by youth who are coming out as LGBT."

He said that usually by the time students reach their mid-teens, they are fully aware of their sexual preference, and it is important to make those who are establishing themselves as part of the LGBT community feel welcome and accepted as members of the Jewish community.

"Our services are inclusive and... it is our desire in general to be responsive to needs that are expressed by members of our community."

He said although there may not be established high school gay groups at this point, JF&C is still dedicated to working with individual students who are interested in JF&C programming.

"We are aware that it is our responsibility as a family service organization to provide, safety, support, and enrichment to every facet of the community," Cummings said.

"I think it is really important, given that there are those who think this is controversial, that we can come up with a constructive message here."

Until three months ago, Noreen Kasman, a parent of a gay daughter, ran a monthly discussion group at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in Toronto for parents of gay children.

"I know when my daughter came out three years ago, I looked everywhere for a group of Jewish parents and there wasn't one... What I wanted was other parents out there who had dealt with the shock, or whatever, of finding out their child was gay and that they survived and I could survive, too," Kasman said.

"Some people might want to put their head in the sand and hide it and some people are perfectly OK, but there are still people who need to talk and want to hear from another parent."

She said she spoke to her rabbi and convinced him that a group for parents of gay children was needed. Last year, Kasman partnered with another member of her congregation, who is a social worker, and she offered to come to the monthly meetings to serve as a resource person.

"We had a small turnout, but by May, we had nobody come. We're both volunteers and we're both busy, so we decided... to just stop."

Richard Cummings

Although Kasman decided to end the sessions, she said she is still available to parents who need to talk.

"I will always have a gay child, and although I don't feel the same turmoil as I felt three years ago when my hopes and expectations were turned upside down, I'm sure that I'm not the only one, and I'm sure that every day, some Jewish child tells their parents, 'I'm gay,'" she said.

"Look, I'm in my early 60s and I didn't expect this, and there have got to be other people in their 50s who don't expect it and don't know how to handle it or find resource material. It took me a long time to gather this information and I am quite willing to share it."

Kasman added that if someone contacted her to meet, or if there was interest from the community to revive the monthly discussion group, she'd be more than willing to become involved again.

"I know that there is always a room available in my synagogue," she said.

"I think this is something that shouldn't be put aside and Meeting needs by doing, not talking

- "I think that if there is any lesson that is readily available to us as Torontonians, it is that this is a diverse world," said Richard Cummings, the executive director of Jewish Family and Child (JF&C) Toronto.
- "By respecting our differences, we are opening ourselves up to the opportunity to enrich our own lives by learning that there are many ways to live a life, and as long as we are not harming one another, I think we benefit from acceptance and openness."
- He added that it doesn't mean we have to accept certain lifestyle choices for ourselves but we must always respect other people's way of life.
- In the meantime, Cummings said that JF&C has a responsibility "to keep our ear to the ground, and certainly it is our mission in a sense to be responsive to the expressions of need in the community."

Noreen Kasman, the parent of a gay daughter, agreed that members of the Jewish community should be more open and welcoming to diversity.

- "I don't mean just talking, I mean doing. Running groups, running programs that have appeal to gay Jewish adults or teens. People say, 'Oh, yes, we're welcoming. Oh yes, we would never stop a gay person from having an aliyah or opening the Ark.'"
- But she said that instead of having the community talk about being inclusive, they should just be inclusive.
- "I don't see anyone approaching a gay, young person and saying, 'If you want to maintain your connection to Judaism, how can we help you? What can we do for you?' I don't know how to solve that one." Kasman said.
- Kasman can be contacted at kasman@rogers.com. For more information about JF&C, visit www.jfandcs.com.

Winery revives an ancient tradition in the Judean hills

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The production of wine in Israel's Yatir Forest in the southern Judean hills has come full circle after 2,500 years.

Here, deep in the folds of the largest planted forest in Israel, members of three neighbouring moshavim tend to 11 vineyards on 500 dunams of land at an altitude of 600 to 900 metres above sea level. (One dunam is equal to about 900 square metres).

The Yatir Winery – a joint venture of Beit Yatir, Carmel and Maon and the historic Carmel Winery in Zichron Ya'acov – is in Tel Arad, a short distance from the Yatir Forest, a Jewish National Fund project.

The vineyards are on the semi-arid slopes of Mount Hebron, close to the West Bank.

Producing award-winning kosher wines sold in Canada, the vineyards are of relatively new vintage, but the tradition that underpins them is as old as recorded history. The name Yatir is derived from a Levite city cited in the Book of Joshua.

Area is still 'magnificent wine country'

"Wine was made here by Jews after the destruction of the first and second temples," said Etti Edri, a Yatir Winery manager, in an interview.

She spoke in a shed adjoining the George A. Cohon Family Youth Activities Centre, which was created after the 1993 Negev Dinner in Toronto.

Ancient wine presses, which bear witness to a fairly sophisticated wine industry for which this region was known in biblical Judea two millennia ago, have been excavated at archeological sites around the forest.

This is magnificent wine country.

The soil is stony and well-drained and the climate is virtually perfect, with cool mornings, hot and sunny days and cold nights during part of the year.

There is little rainfall, but a reservoir built by the Jewish National Fund and holding 650,000 cubic metres of water effectively solves that problem.

Up to 15 per cent of the water is diverted to the vineyards. The rest is used to irrigate lush fruit orchards in clearings in the forest, which covers an area of approximately 30,000 dunams and contains more than four million trees, notably Aleppo and Jerusalem pines, Cypresses and Tamarisks.

In a nod of gratitude to the Jewish National Fund, which prepared the land for the vineyards and orchards, the Yatir Winery named its first brand Yatir Forest. "It's our premier label," said Edri.

A blend of Cabernet Sauvignon and Merlot, this estate wine is aged in French oak barrels for 15 months, and is unfiltered. Red purple in colour, with an aroma of blackberries, blackcurrants and Mediterranean herbs, it is advertised as a fine textured wine with a soft, velvety finish.

Winery produces 200,000 bottles a year

Its second label, Yatir Cabernet Merlot Shiraz, is also unfiltered and is aged in French oak barrels for 12 months. It has rich ruby colouring and smacks of the whiff of black plums and exotic spices, with a hint of coffee and chocolate.

Its third label, Yatir Sauvignon Blanc, is cultivated in the Ramat Arad vineyard, in the northeastern Negev Desert. Cold fermented before being aged for three months in French oak barrels, it is fruity and pale straw in colour, the aroma combining citrus and grassy, mineral notes.

The man behind the labels is Eran Goldwasser, who studied viticulture and oenology at the University of Adelaide and who worked in Australia as an assistant winemaker.

TheYatir Winery launched its first line of wines with a run of 30,000 bottles per year but now produces 200,000 bottles annually.

"We're no longer a boutique winery," said Edri. "But we don't want to produce more than 250,000 bottles. We prefer to stay small."

Yatir Winery exports one-tenth of its wines abroad. Export markets apart from Canada include France, the United States, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Russia and Sweden.

Yatir's marketing strategy is straightforward, Edri said. "We sell it not as a kosher wine but as a great wine."

Apples, cherries and peaches also grow here

Although the cultivation of wine grapes is synonymous with this area, crops ranging from table grapes and apples to cherries and peaches are also grown here.

Many of the farmers, such as Aharon Zwibel, are Orthodox Jews.

Zwibel, 49, lives in Carmel, which, like Maon but not Beit Yatir, is just inside the West Bank. Sixty to 90 families live in each of the moshavim, which were founded in the mid-1980s.

A father of eight who has five grandchildren, Zwibel originally lived on a moshav near Petach Tikvah. His Romanian parents immigrated to Palestine in 1946.

"This is a good place for agriculture," he said, handing out freshly picked peaches to his visitors.

As he scanned the pastoral horizon, he saw nothing but symmetrical rows of trees in the Yatir Forest, which was planted in 1964.

The chief forester, Abed Abu Alkealin, is a 47-year-old Bedouin from the nearby town of Hura. He started as a watchman and was promoted to his current position in 2003.

His main task is twofold: to battle pests and to ward off fires by trimming branches at the base of trees.

The trimmings are given away, free of charge, to Palestinians from West Bank villages who use them as kindling.

On major Jewish holidays, the forest is packed with visitors, who rarely fail to appreciate the beauty of a pristine forest on the edge of harsh desert terrain.

Educational director hopes to energize community

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Dan Mendelsohn Aviv took on the position of educational director at Temple Emanu-El last year, he wanted to freshen things up.

"But it's not like we re-invented the wheel," said Aviv, the director of the Reform shul's Centre for Jewish Learning and Living and the new Lomdim program. "It's a model that anyone can adopt."

Aviv explained that Lomdim, which is Hebrew for "we learn," presents students of all ages with five pillars on which the program is based: choice, unconventional topics, a variety of courses, community and multi-generational learning, and flexible scheduling.

The idea is that the students can exercise choice when it comes to what they'll study. There are a variety of courses, such as "Jews and Food," "Fixing the World" and "Ivrit on your Feet" – traditional topics that are presented in an alternative way. Classes are held on Sundays, Shabbat mornings and Tuesday evenings, and students are not limited to studying with only kids their age.

"We talk about religious school, Hebrew school, Sunday school, and it is very limited to children of a certain age. Occasionally it includes their parents, never includes grandparents, and it doesn't include members of the temple who don't have kids," Aviv said.

"The concept focuses on learning from age five to 55 to 95, and we have all different kinds of programs that we put in place this year by way of a pilot that we're going to expand," he said.

"We have more traditional school-type arrangements, but even then, it's shaken up a bit in the sense that there are nine hours of programming available [each week], and individuals, depending on how old they are; come for either three hours or four hours, or even more, depending on how much they want to do."

He said Lomdim was piloted last winter and he was encouraged by the response from the community.

"We had about 170 people participate over five weeks. I think by the fifth week, people could not find parking. It was very packed, very nice to see, and I was tickled by the complaints about the lack of parking."

Aviv, who is originally from Chicago but came to Toronto from Jerusalem after completing his doctorate in Jewish Education from the Hebrw University of Jerusalem, said he was brought on board at Temple Emanu-El to make Lomdim happen.

Dan Mendelsohn Aviv

"My doctoral dissertation was focused on the idea of food, not just as an interesting topic for education and learning, but as sort of a way of re-conceiving how we learn. A lot of the language used when we're learning involves the metaphor of sight. Like, when someone says, 'Do you see what I mean?' you say, 'Yes, I see what you mean,'" Aviv explained.

"One of the things I looked at in my research was the idea that in the Jewish tradition, we don't consider knowledge quite in the same way. We have a different metaphor, the metaphor of eating. I call it the consumption model, and if you go back to the first story of Adam and Eve, the fruit from the tree of knowledge is what opens their eyes.

"If you think about the community sitting around a table at mealtime as a model for what should happen in the classroom – you could beat this metaphor to death," he said.

He added that when he presented this idea to the board, they were taken by it.

Lomdim isn't exclusive to members of the shul, as it does organize events that are open to the entire community, but the courses are meant for the membership of about 360 families, he said.

The courses run for eight weeks and there are fall, spring and winter sessions.

"Learning is another way of forging a connection with the Jewish community."

For more information, visit www.templeemanuel.ca/index.php/learning/lomdim_365/.

Lomdim works on establishing 'good habits' for kids

Much of what Dan Mendelsohn Aviv hopes to do through the Lomdim program is to keep the older generation connected to the community and to help the next generations create a lasting bond with Judaism.

- "We're trying to establish good habits – that includes going to services, becoming involved in social action projects, learning divrei Torah. The [students] are becoming a part of the community and they need to have certain habits in place," he said.
- Some of the courses are designed to take the kids out into the community. "For example, we're doing, for the first time… a social action project for their bar mitzvahs, rather than it be this individual extracurricular affair. It's going to happen as a group. As a small community, they're going to go to a site and work, and take their time. But it's not necessarily extracurricular, it's curricular."
- While schools require that kids do social action projects, the programs lack any real context, he said. "We are going to create the context and there will be learning around it."
- Subjects like the genocide in Darfur are among the courses the shul provides. "Tikkun olam is one of the pillars of the curriculum, as is Judaism, Jewish history, etc."
- Aviv said he wants to encourage children who are approaching bar and bat mitzvah age to be good members of the Jewish community. As it says in the program catalogue, "we believe that Jewish learning energizes Jewish living, Jewish learning happens best in the context of community, and Jewish learning should support and challenge learners to become accomplished progressive Jews."

Singles enjoy nature while they walk, socialize and learn about different areas of the city as part of Walk and Talk Etc.

Walking group brings 50+ singles together

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Marcy Greenglass and Marilyn Slatter had already been walking together for a couple of decades when someone sat them down at a meeting in Earl Bales Park four years ago and tried to pass off an insurance sales pitch as a walking group for Jewish singles.

It was that day which set the two women in motion to form Walk and Talk Etc., a walking and social group for Jewish singles older than 50.

"I got very upset, because what [this woman] did really was just take us around the park and sat us in the amphitheatre, where she really had a captive audience and talked about her insurance," recalled Greenglass.

"I saw that there was a need for Jewish people" to socialize in a non-intimidating way, she added.

"This is very relaxed. People get to know each other by walking and learning about the history of the city."

Now in its fourth year, Walk and Talk Etc. provides Jewish singles in the Toronto area with an opportunity to expand their social network, or it simply gives them a chance to come out and shmooze.

The only criterion for membership is a desire to maintain a healthy body and mind through outdoor walking.

Walks take place twice a month on Sunday mornings. Each excursion is planned to be unique while serving a diversity of interests. Locations vary so that new and interesting sites can be introduced to members.

Participants learn about the history, cultural diversity and economic value of various neighborhoods and sites that they visit.

Social events, including bowling, theatre outings, and wine tasting are also offered each month.

The active and energetic duo say members range in age from 50 to 65, although Slatter doesn't give any indication she'll be ready to leave the group when she reaches the latter milestone age next year.

She said it's a group for people who don't care about how old they are.

"The only reason we start at 50 is because there is a commonality," she said. "Most of the people who are our age are either retired or semi-retired into the next phase of their lives."

Walking gives them a great way to connect with others and enjoy the benefits of exercise. The group appeals to nature lovers, history enthusiasts, photographers, and those wanting to meet others with common interests, they say.

An average walk attracts 20 to 25 participants and includes people who have never been married, widows and widowers, and divorcees.

"We don't ask people what their situation is, unless they want to talk about it," Slatter said. "They are not there for a pity party. They are there to make a new life, make new friends, get on with their lives."

Greenglass said it can be intimidating when you want to do something and don't have someone to do it with.

Walks begin at 9:30 a.m., rain or shine, year round, and last one to two hours, depending on the weather. The group meets for lunch afterward. Only once has a walk been stopped for the weather – when the group encountered pouring rain with thunder and lightning.

Greenglass and Slatter research and plan the walks, giving commentary along the way in trying to highlight the history of the area and find a connection to Judaism, pointing out the role that our ancestors have played in building the city.

The focus of some walks is historical and has included tours of Queens Park Circle, the Don Valley Brickworks and Todmorden Mills. Others have explored natural areas such as Sherwood Park, Rouge Park and the Lakeshore Trail.

In addition to researching walks for their location, access, points of interest, washroom and parking facilities, Greenglass and Slatter also choose the restaurants for lunch, which lets walkers connect and form bonds with people they may never have met before.

"We have tried to encourage restaurants to accommodate us, hoping that once we introduce our members to them, they will go back," Greenglass said.

Membership is $40 and covers a six-month period.

For more information, contact Greenglass or Slatter at walkandtalketc@hotmail.com.

Mississauga woman fights war against garbage

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Benita Grist was driving on a highway in Mississauga when someone in the car in front of her threw fast-food wrappers out of the window.

Outraged, Grist honked, only to be met with more garbage.

That was the last straw.

"I'd had enough. There's a lack of respect from when I grew up to now. [Littering] is a problem. If it's not stopped, we'll be sorry for it," she said.

Grist grew up in the Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue area, a neighbourhood that she said used to look a lot different. "It was clean. I was proud to be there."

Last month, Grist started her war against garbage. She began going door to door in her Mississauga neighbourhood to ask people to stop littering.

"I'll tell you, I have never been so amazed. As I was going door to door, people were following me. All I had to do was open my mouth," she said.

Benita Grist is trying to stop litterbugs through education, not clean-up drives.

After receiving a positive reaction from her neighbours, Grist decided to take her battle further. She began contacting churches, mosques and a synagogue to ask for help in educating the community.

"For the most part, everyone was so willing to help me. I thought, why don't I go even further. I called radio stations, phoned newspapers, I'm trying to hit different groups," she said. "I phoned city hall. I want to work hand in hand with city hall. I have a meeting scheduled."

To prepare for her meeting, Grist began talking to people on the street to gather opinions and information. The overwhelming feedback was that nothing would be done without proper education.

"Not only do adolescents give that opinion, but adults do, too. Teachers say, 'We already educate them.' Twice a year is not good enough," she said.

Grist would like to see environmental education start as early as kindergarten.

"Obviously, the adults doing it [littering] were never taught as kids," she said. "[Kids] are very impressionable in kindergarten. [Schools] should continue to reiterate that littering is wrong. The child will correct the parent – you'll kill two birds with one stone."

Grist, however, is not interested in community drives and clean-up projects.

"I don't want anybody out there thinking that they have to pick up for anybody else. It's more than trying to pick [the garbage] up, it's back the next day. It's not going to end until you get to the minds of the people doing it."

Grist hopes to do this by spreading her message. Currently, she's delivering information sheets door to door and hopes to have posters up in the future. She's also contacted various companies about litter.

"I phoned Tim Hortons, Nestle, McDonald's I've got to tell you, every fast-food chain [I contacted] are all on board. None of them are saying, 'It's not my problem,'" she said. "I'm looking for commercials. I'm looking for signs, anything that will attract attention."

Grist believes that the public would not have reacted as positively if she were part of an organization.

"If I was an organization, I don't think people would listen. It's unique. I'm retired. I'm not fundraising, I'm not asking for volunteers, that's why it works," she said.

"I have nothing to gain by this. It's a crusade, a mission. It's my home as much as anyone else's."

As a Jewish grandmother, Grist believes that the environment is everyone's responsibility.

"Whether you're Jewish, it affects everyone. We're just as guilty – our own people need an education," she said.

So far, Grist has seen a difference on her street and hopes to see a difference in other neighbourhoods, as well.

"This is not a one-time thing. I've been told that I'm on a futile endeavour, but I'm not going to give up. They could be right, but I've got to try," she said.

Education is the key

- Education is the key to stop littering. Expose children to recycling at a young age by starting a weekly recyling regime.
- Putting a child in charge of getting the recycling bin out every week or sorting the garbage will help them understand the importance of recycling.
- Reduce the amount of garbage you create. Use plastic containers instead of paper bags to hold lunches. Use e-mail instead of paper memos at the office. Reuse water bottles and other plastic containers.

World music days honour slain Jewish journalist

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Daniel Pearl's family couldn't sit back and let his February 2002 murder at the hands of terrorists go unanswered.

Though his death – a videotaped beheading by radicals in Karachi, Pakistan – made news headlines around the world and is still talked about today, the subsequent birth of the Daniel Pearl Foundation in April of that year was also significant.

The Pearl family wanted to honour their journalist son's memory by creating a non-profit organization that promoted "cross-cultural understanding through journalism, music and innovative communications."

The "music" part of this equation turned into what the foundation calls a musical "awareness-raiser" titled Daniel Pearl World Music Days.

Aside from being a renowned journalist, Pearl was also a classically trained violinist and a proficient mandolin player.

Over the last six years, the foundation has promoted October as a month-long chance for musicians, bands and entertainers to take a moment to dedicate a live song or act to Daniel and keep his memory alive.

Daniel Pearl

Pearl's birthday is Oct. 10.

"Danny was a talented musician who joined musical groups in every community in which he lived, leaving behind a long trail of musician friends spanning the entire world," states the Daniel Pearl World Music Days website, adding that October should be used to promote the "universal language of music to encourage fellowship across cultures and build a platform for 'Harmony for Humanity.'"

The site provides ways that visitors – musicians and non-musicians alike – can participate in the music days by submitting to the site's public "eStage" their own music, poetry, lyrics, photographs or any other creative endeavour.

The eStage is a streaming Internet radio station that broadcasts music "inspired by Danny's journey, as well as his own recordings," the website states.

Speaking to The CJN last week from their home in California, Daniel's parents, Judea and Ruth Pearl, emphasized the importance of World Music Days.

"Music was a form of communication for [Daniel]," Judea said, adding that his son saw it as a way to "open doors for interfaith alliances," because all religions can find a "common dialogue" through the power of music.

Judea also framed World Music Days as a means of defending freedom and democracy, calling the annual event an act of defiance against everything Daniel's murderers stand for.

"It's the voice of Mozart versus barbarism," he stated. "It gives the audience the feeling of defending against barbarism."

Ruth concurred and said her son found peace through music via its "empowering and enlightening" qualities.

"He learned to read music before he learned English," Ruth said.

Since World Music Days' inception, more than 2,000 concerts in 77 countries have been dedicated in memory of Pearl.

"In 2007, artists at more than 500 concerts in 42 countries set a record by speaking out for sanity and humanity," World Music Days' program manager Paul Karlsen, said in a recent statement, adding that the foundation's e-stage has enabled "musicians to introduce themselves to an international audience [that] shares their vision for world peace and cross-cultural understanding."

The World Music Days' honorary committee reads like a who's who list of famous international artists, including, Theodore Bikel, Yefim Bronfman, Ida Haendel, Herbie Hancock, Elton John, Yo-Yo Ma, Zubin Mehta, Mark O'Connor, George Pehlivanian, Itzhak Perlman, R.E.M., Mohammad Reza Shajarian, Ravi Shankar, Russell Simmons, Barbra Streisand, and John Williams.

A Canadian World Music Days committee was struck last May by members of Temple Har Zion in Thornhill, Ont., and it promotes "champions" of the cause from coast to coast, said Ron Smith, who chairs the committee.

As of last week, the World Music Days website listed six Canadian musical events dedicated to Pearl's memory scheduled to take place this October and a total of 137 scheduled worldwide, including four in Israel and 93 in the United States.

The seventh annual Daniel Pearl World Music Days begins Oct. 1.

For more information, visit www.danielpearlmusicdays.org or e-mail Cdn-committee@danielpearlmusicdays.org

How to promote tolerance and peace

The following are six suggestions from the Daniel Pearl World Music Days organizers on how to get involved and promote tolerance and peace.

- Musicians can dedicate a song or concert.
- DJs can dedicate live gigs and radio shows.
- Orchestras can dedicate concerts or compositions.
- Youth groups can dedicate performances in auditoriums or at sports events.
- Bands and solo artists can dedicate nightclub, coffeehouse, school, community centre and special event performances.
- Everyone can contribute music, lyrics, poems, dedications, stories, articles, photographs and videos on the theme of "Harmony for Humanity" to the World Music Days' eStage.

Torontonian organizes bar/bat mitzvahs for underprivileged Israelis

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Max Benaim is no stranger to volunteering his time and energy to improving the Jewish communities both in Canada and Israel.

But his latest project has him excited and enthusiastic about an opportunity to make a big difference in the lives of Israeli children.

Benaim, a Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation board member and a Sephardi Jewish community volunteer, is leading a program that will provide underprivileged Israeli children with a bar or bat mitzvah celebration at the Kotel in Jerusalem.

Benaim said he hopes to bring 60 children – some of whom will come from the rocket embattled town of Sderot and others from a foster home in Karmiel – to Jerusalem for two days this December, during which they will participate in a ceremony and enjoy a reception at the Sephardic Educational Center.

"There will be a big religious ceremony at the Kotel on Monday morning, and from there we will go to the Sephardic Educational Center in Yerushalayim for a big lunch with music and presents for all the kids," Benaim said, adding that the Sephardic Educational Center (SEC) agreed to accommodate the children as well as their parents.

"The SEC is giving me a really good price on the accommodation and the meals, which is great. It's a beautiful program."

He is in the process of raising the funds necessary to give Israeli children the gift of a bar or bat mitzvah.

"My goal is to raise enough money for 60 children, which coincides with the 60th anniversary of the State of Israel. When I set a goal, I'm going to reach my goal. I have to raise $36,000, which is double chai. It's about $600 a child," he said.

Children will come from the north and south of Israel

With the funds raised, Benaim said he will purchase brand-new tfillin sets, tallitot and siddurim for each boy, and a siddur and a gift for each girl.

"We're also going to hire a sofer. The sofer will be explaining what is in the tfillin cases… we're going to teach them the importance of bar mitzvah and bat mitzvah," he said.

He said he hopes people will opt to sponsor a child or donate as a family in memory or in honour of a loved one.

"I urge the community to partake in this big mitzvah. It's for underprivileged children, and it's a big mitzvah," Benaim said.

"Look how much money we spend on weddings, how much money is spent on bar mitzvahs. It's like a Hollywood production. Imagine someone here spending $30-, $40-, $50,000 dollars on a bar or bat mitzvah, and for just $600 you have the opportunity to have an underprivileged child celebrate his bar mitzvah at the Kotel. Isn't that beautiful?"

Benaim said that he hopes to have two bus loads of children and their parents – one from the south of Israel and the other from the north – coming to Jerusalem for the two-day program.

He said he invites anyone who is interested in experiencing the program to join him.

Benaim, who said that this initiative is a one-man show, wants the community here to understand that one person can make a difference in the lives of many.

"I don't want any medals, but I want to put out there that people can do a lot of stuff – they don't need a big organization or a big committee or anything. If you really set your mind towards a goal, you can reach it."

He added that all of his volunteer work is done in honour of his late sister, who was killed in a car accident when she was seven years old.

"She didn't have the opportunity to have a bar mitzvah. She is always with me. I do this for the benefit of children and especially underprivileged kids. Without this, maybe they never would have had a decent bar or bat mitzvah. This is one of the commandments – help your brother."

For more information, Max Benaim can be reached at 416-918-0676 or through Petah Tikva at 416-636-4719.

GIRLS DO DOUBLE MITZVAH: Seven girls donated hair for the Pantene Beautiful Lengths campaign in association with the Canadian Cancer Society. The hair is being used to make wigs for women who have lost their hair as a result of cancer treatment. The girls, who attend Jewish day schools in the Toronto area, also collected money for the Israel Cancer Research Fund. From left, Aidyn Kimel, Noa Cowley, Ashley Bly, Sammy Hacker, Lindsay Lyons, Jordyn Kimel and Alexandra Anisman are seen with Dani from Dani's Hair Salon, who donated his time for this cause.

Children experience Yiddish culture at Koffler/Ashkenaz camp

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

A new generation will be exposed to Yiddish culture this year at the Koffler Centre's art camp.

For the first time, the Koffler Centre of the Arts is partnering with the Ashkenaz Festival for a one-week camp.

The camp, which runs from Aug. 25 to 29, features festival performers and participants, including Socalled, a hip-hop musician, and Avia Moore, a dance teacher.

These artists offer campers a window into Yiddish culture.

"So many of our presenters are young. They're working in the world of Yiddish culture today. [The kids] will have the ability to see [Yiddish culture] is thriving, it's fun, it's not old or dying," said Evelyn Tauben, head of programs and exhibitions at Koffler.

"It's a really unique opportunity to have close interaction with very talented, skilled artists."

The camp's interactive environment and unique activities are what sets it apart.

"It's important for Koffler to do something to make a new offering in the community, to differentiate ourselves. There's nothing else like this," Tauben said.

Along with dancers and musicians, a team from Shadowland Theatre is visiting the Koffler Centre. Shadowland artists specialize in puppetry, mask-making, stilt-walking and parade techniques. Campers will be able to work with Shadowland to make puppets and props for the group's parade, which will be held on Sept. 1, the last day of Ashkenaz.

Anne Barber has been part of Shadowland Theatre since 1992. Along with the rest of the Shadowland team, she will help campers understand the concept of parade as art.

"We're teaching them how to work outdoors in a theatrical way, how to work with puppets and flags. We really make it fun for them. Kids in schools are so limited by materials and resources. They're used to drawing on a sheet of paper. We create much bigger things," Barber said.

"It's really exciting to introduce people to the idea of celebrating their culture in a big, bold way. They'll get to understand that Yiddish culture isn't just klezmer music. It's still a living culture… It's not just something from your bubbie or zaide – it's still alive and progressing and can be done in different forms."

Tauben, who used to organize Yiddish activities for young adults in Philadelphia, said Yiddish culture is relevant to all generations.

"It's personally close to my heart. [Yiddish] is an entry point. It's a way of being Jewish that is often overlooked. It's that mix of what was so dynamic and radical in the past and how that energy is playing out today that's really interesting."

Through the camp's interactive activities, Tauben hopes to teach campers that Yiddish is about more than language.

"I think it's a series of assumptions and misunderstandings about Yiddish. It's not just a language. Through this language, there's a whole body of theatre, poetry and music," she said. "If you don't know that, you miss the point."

With the help of Ashkenaz performers, campers will be able to experience the growth of Yiddish culture.

"It's specifically through the cultural emergence that it can't be overlooked," she said.

Tauben used Socalled as an example of this growth. "Here we have a guy in his 20s, he's singing and rapping in Yiddish. You can't ignore it. It's amazing. [Yiddish] was a connection for him, to the point where he created a whole new genre of music."

To Eric Stein, the artistic director of Ashkenaz, young Jews are the key to a thriving Yiddish culture.

"If we care about these cultural traditions, the only way for them to survive is for the younger generation to get exposed to them and get invested in them. The earlier, the better. Young people have the ability to absorb and assimilate a lot more information," he said. "It becomes a lifelong thing."

Both the camp and the Ashkenaz Festival allow Jewish youth to experience Yiddish music, dance and art first-hand.

"Often kids are too young to tune into stereotypes. It's a matter of feeling and touching up close. It reveals things that otherwise will not be revealed. [The campers] will get a sense of the soul and feel of it. It's something that's within us all, it's our historical and cultural heritage," Stein said.

Dispelling stereotypes about yiddish

- Expose kids to elements of Yiddish culture at an early age to help dispel stereotypes.
- The Ashkenaz Festival is a great place to absorb new Yiddish culture, including modern Yiddish dance, theatre and art, as well as new music styles. The festival runs from Aug. 26 to Sept. 1. For more information, visit www.ashkenazfestival.com.

A shtetl in Mexico

By HINDY NOSEK-ABELSON
Special to The CJN

I recently returned to Toronto after spending 3-1/2 years enjoying a Jewish life in Ajijic, a village in Mexico not far from Guadalajara, Mexico's second-largest city. For me, it was a choice between continuing to live abroad or being near my adorable new grandson. My grandson naturally won.

Tied with Kenya for the best climate on the planet, Ajijic and the surrounding villages provide a perpetually sunny haven for an estimated 15,000-plus retirees from the United States and Canada. Many of them are Jews who move there either as a winter retreat (as is the case with Canadians who don't want to give up their medicare) or to enjoy the richness of a full-time retirement that, while in a foreign country, provides a familiar yet exotic environment. What a diverse group they are, with former lives ranging from judges to environmental experts and every profession in between. And what a cast of colourful characters.

All are drawn by the incomparable weather, gorgeous scenery and inexpensive lifestyle. Prices of everything are roughly one-third of what they are in Canada and the United States. Housing styles range from basic town homes to luxurious villas. All are affordable on a North American budget.

As in many tropical climes, homes are generally built behind walls that conceal lush tropical gardens and colourful décor, a welcome departure from the familiar monotonous themes that grace residences in North America. Though most Canadians and Americans are attracted to Ajijic because of the low cost of living, they stay because they fall in love with the setting and lifestyle.

A bed and breakfast

View of the mountains from the town

A solid infrastructure of Anglo organizations, galleries, outstanding international restaurants, theatres, concert halls and places of worship, including a thriving synagogue and growing Jewish community, allow retirees to resume many of the same interests and activities they enjoyed in Canada and the United States

Ajijic has been an artists' centre for more than 40 years, hence the explosion of galleries and local talent. The creative and flourishing arts traditions of Mexico also inspire many to reinvent themselves and become what they always wanted to be. They study art, drama, attend writing classes and engage in volunteer work for a myriad of causes that include orphanages, health services, old age homes or their own religious communities.

For me, it was especially important that I continue my Jewish community involvement. I gave classes on Yiddish songs and culture, delivered parshahs based on women in the Torah and served on the board of the Lake Chapala Jewish Congregation, where I made many life-long friends. We even taught the local Mexican baker how to bake challah and bagels.

Among the locals are a smattering of Conversos, whose families left Spain during the Inquisition. One of them was a lawyer who I met while selling real estate there. His last name is Cuen. When my Irish client asked him if it was originally Quinn, he proudly informed us that it actually stemmed from Cohen and that his ancestors were Spanish Jews.

Another Converso is a local ophthalmologist who, when he discovered his own Jewish lineage, converted back to Judaism along with his Converso wife. Delighted to find the local Jewish community, they promptly joined our shul. The same was true of a few more Mexican members, who are currently undergoing conversion classes.

Calla lilies grow year-round

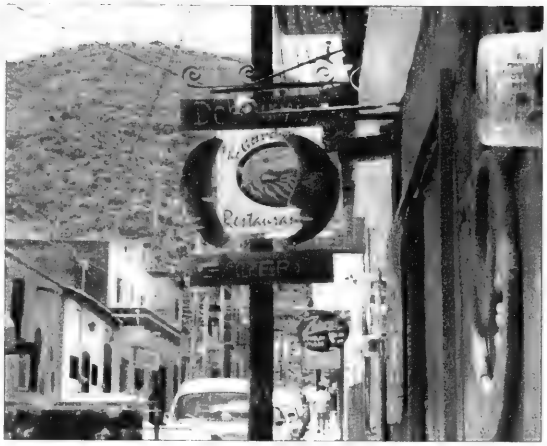
In Ajijic, many kosher American brands can be picked up at the local supermarket that specializes in North American foods. Kosher meats are available in Guadalajara (a mere 45-minute drive from Ajijic), where there is a small but active Jewish community of roughly 200 families. For most of the year, our congregation is lay led. For the High Holidays, Chanukah and other occasions such as Shabbaton retreats, visiting rabbis are brought in. After all, how many rabbis would refuse a gig in paradise?

Ajijic is nestled between the lush Sierra Madre Mountains and Mexico's largest lake, Lake Chapala. The weather is perfect year-round and the scenery is like eye candy. Because of the altitude – approximately 5,200 feet above sea level – the air is pure, and humidity, even during the rainy season, which starts mid-June and ends some time in September, is virtually non-existent. The temperature is in the mid-70s to mid-80s year-round and it's sunny. When it does rain, it does so obediently, mainly at night. And while the seasons can appear indistinguishable, they are differentiated by the brilliant flora and fauna that seemingly pop up in the blink of an eye. The winter brings forth bougainvillea of every hue, while in spring, purple jacarandas cascade from the trees. Calla lilies and a host of other floral varieties, only available in Canada as short-lived cut bouquets, grow like weeds throughout the year.



A commercial street in town

A residential street in the village

For some bizarre reason, I felt instantly at home in Ajijic and connected at a level that I couldn't have possibly anticipated before my arrival to this picturesque little village. It took a couple of months to understand where that "soul" connection originated from.

I recall hearing the foreign yet strangely familiar sound of horses clip-clopping on the cobblestone street outside my village home. My daily walks took me past vistas of children playing freely and cheerfully on narrow village streets, unafraid to talk to strangers and obviously secure in the knowledge that neighbours keep a watchful eye on them. The locals are gentle, soft-spoken and kind. I remember my daughter laughing when I told her that you hardly ever hear children crying and that even the dogs are friendly. When she came for the first of many visits, she realized that I wasn't exaggerating.

The presence of pedlars and fishmongers, as well as artisans on every corner, also tugged on some vague ancestral memory. Here I was, a sophisticated urbane Jewish woman, living in a quaint Mexican hamlet where fathers still pass the skills of carpentry, glass-blowing, upholstering, cobbling, wood-carving and a host of traditional trades on to their sons, while mothers teach the art of sewing, weaving, pottery and a sundry of beautiful time-honoured crafts to their daughters.

This is a place where most things are still handmade and labourers often sing at the top of their lungs while working, where dilapidated trucks with loudspeakers blare the news of the wares they carry to all within earshot.

No one is in a rush

By the lake

(Please see more photos on page B32)

It felt like a time warp in which no one is in a rush and where what doesn't get finished today might get done tomorrow. Expatriates quickly learn that "mañana" is actually a euphemism for "whenever." The concept is so infectious that most "gringos" eventually stop fretting and simply learn to go with the flow.

In Ajijic, three and four generations still live under the same roof. People are poor but happy. Seniors are honoured for their wisdom and contributions to society. And, the faces, especially of the elderly, emerged like something out of my mystical past. Each one was worthy of a portrait. Old, wizened and permanently etched with the lines of experience, hard work and sacrifice, there wasn't a smidgen of vanity among them.

In Ajijic, every month brings yet another fiesta – a yom tov and simchah or two to celebrate – providing yet another excuse for itinerant mariachis to play under your windows, just like our klezmorim, the itinerant musicians of eastern Europe.

That's when it hit me that I, an urban modern Toronto Jewess, was actually living in a shtetl, similar to that which my ancestors hailed from and fled – but with an infinitely more humane Mexican twist.

Although Mexican villages are predominantly Catholic, the Mexican brand of Catholicism is a unique blend of the religion conquistadors brought from Spain, with indigenous Aztec and Mayan tribal traditions. Despite the efforts of the Catholic Church at indoctrination of the population, there is a profound lack of fanaticism in the piety of the locals who have an easygoing live and let live mentality. Even the Church has been forced to adopt this same tolerant attitude toward the traditions that villagers stubbornly cling to from their indigenous past.

Some scholars suggest that the ancient Aztec and Mayan belief in many gods is what accounts for this relaxed attitude to other beliefs. That could well be why, despite the pre-eminence of the church, Mexican Jews have lived relatively free from persecution. For educated Mexicans, the Catholic Inquisition against Jews is comparable to what they view as the heinous destruction of their own indigenous cultures by the conquistadors and their church.

I remember reflecting that this was the kind of shtetl my ancestors could only dream of and pray for. No Cossacks. No pogroms. Friendly neighbours. Had this been the environment in Europe, many of us would still be there.

Unexpectedly, there were even some local traditions that I, as a Jew could relate to. The lavish quinze annos that poor Mexican parents save for in order to throw a party for their daughters' 15th birthday is rather like a bat mitzvah without the religious connotations – but with an equal amount of naches shepped.

Guide to care of Orthodox elderly published

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A candid explanation of why many Orthodox Jewish seniors are suspicious or even fearful of providers of health and personal care is offered in a newly published handbook titled Bridging Worlds.

Written by Ahavas Chesed, a grassroots social service agency in Montreal's Orthodox community, the handbook contains practical advice for professionals and workers on how to overcome the resistance and phobias they may encounter among their religious Jewish clients. The publication also serves as a primer on the Orthodox community's history, religious customs and lifestyles.

This type of straightforward information and guidance is needed, according to Ahavas Chesed director Carol Polter, because of the increasing reliance of Orthodox seniors in Montreal on "outside" help.

About 80 per cent of these elderly Jews are Holocaust survivors, a fact that compounds the community's traditional reluctance to accept assistance from those not their own.

Admitting "foreign" service providers into their homes and letting them give them intimate care does not come easily for these seniors, and often their family as well.

At the same time, the often strange practices (to non-Jews) of Orthodox Jews and the seemingly irrational reaction of the elderly to benign situations can be a challenge for even the most well-intentioned caregiver.

Turning to help outside the community has become a necessity for the Orthodox, with more of the younger generation living outside Montreal or otherwise unable to assume responsibility for all of their elderly parents' needs.

Home care is not the only issue. Regular medical or hospital treatment can also provoke anxiety among vulnerable Orthodox seniors, the handbook points out. The result is that situations often reach a crisis before they or their families turn for help.

"Survivors remember a world that betrayed their trust in humanity," the handbook states. "For some, coming in contact with hospitals, nurses, social workers and so on, elicits difficult reactions and behaviours, reminiscent of their earlier life of pain and loss." Even those with cognitive loss may still retain a sense of what happened to them during the war years, the book notes.

Ahavas Chesed (Hebrew for loving kindness), founded 13 years ago by Polter, offers crisis management, advocacy, information and referral. Perhaps most importantly, it acts as a cultural interpreter between the Orthodox communities and health care and service providers, both in the public and private sectors. Last year, it held a daylong symposium, also titled Bridging Worlds, attended by about 140 people, from the helping professions, as well as police and other public agencies, to sensitize them to the culture of Orthodox Jews.

Far from being critical of those working with Orthodox seniors, Polter congratulates the great deal of goodwill they show and their genuine desire to better understand and gain the confidence of their clients.

The handbook opens with a sketch of the Jewish community in general in Canada, the Holocaust and Orthodox life today. It explains the nuanced differences between the four major Orthodox populations in Montreal: the Yiddish-speaking "downtown" Outremont Chassidim; the English-speaking "uptown" yeshiva community; the Lubavitch community; and the estimated 35,000 other Jews living mainly in Côte St. Luc, St. Laurent and Dollard des Ormeaux, who follow the Jewish laws strictly but are more integrated into general society.

Bridging Worlds itemizes some of the triggers that can evoke painful memories for survivors, including such everyday occurrences as taking a shower, shots or needles, being shaved, orders to go right or left, or small spaces, such as elevators.

The handbook cites a 2003 survey conducted by Ahavas Chesed and FEDERATION CJA that found that close to one-third of Orthodox seniors have children outside Montreal and are living here alone.

The relationship between Orthodox adult children and their elderly parents can be complex. The children can carry enormous guilt about not doing enough for their parents. Now between 55 and 65 themselves, they are dealing with the demands of their own large families and a growing number of grandchildren.

The picture can get even more complicated if the spouse, usually the wife, elderly herself, has been the caregiver until now of the senior needing help.

"It is this picture into which a worker steps… She will sense, almost hear, 'I need help urgently, but don't even think of helping me,'" the handbook says.

"This worker needs to be well informed about history, about family dynamics, about what is accepted into this home and about how the home is managed."

Workers, whether in the home or an institution, have a responsibility to learn about the Orthodox Holocaust survivor's history to understand what sort of care would be comfortable and what could trigger resistance, Polter said. "They need to understand how the Orthodox survivor's faith will colour all behaviours, how, ultimately, this faith sustains and directs life's decisions."

The handbook says the Orthodox should be offered the choice of a male or female worker, that home-care workers should not dress in an immodest way that might offend their clients, and should not bring non-kosher food into the home. While requests like that became issues of contention during Quebec's "reasonable accommodation" debate, Polter said asking for such considerations is not different from not allowing people to smoke in your home.

Bridging Worlds, which has been published with private donations, may be purchased at a cost of $35 by calling Ahavas Chesed at 514 737-3029 or sending an e-mail to secretary@ahavaschesed.ca. Include "Holocaust Handbook Request" in the subject line. Excerpts from the handbook can be found at www.ahavaschesed.ca.

AIDS pioneer named to Légion d'Honneur

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mark Wainberg, a pioneer in HIV/AIDS research and an outspoken advocate for more governmental support for the disease's prevention and treatment, has been named a Chevalier of France's Légion d'Honneur, a rare honour for non-French citizens bestowed in the name of the French president.

Wainberg is director of the McGill AIDS Centre at the Jewish General Hospital's Lady Davis Institute, which he established in 1984. That was just one year after the virus was isolated, and the lab was the first of its kind in the country.

He is also a past president of the International AIDS Society and co-chaired the 16th international AIDS conference held in Toronto two years ago. In 1989, Wainberg was associated with a major breakthrough, which found that the antiviral drug 3TC (Lamivudine) was effective against HIV.

Wainberg was chosen for inclusion in the Légion for his "exceptional work" in the HIV/AIDS field, as well as in appreciation for "the role you have played in helping to save millions of lives around the world" and in strengthening scientific collaboration and friendship between France and Canada.

Mark Weinberg

For the past five years, Wainberg has chaired the scientific advisory committee of France's national AIDS program.

This is the latest honour for Wainberg, who is an officer of the Order of Canada and a member of the Order of Quebec.

Wainberg, 63, who is also a professor of medicine and microbiology at McGill University, said he never believed that he would still be pursuing a more effective treatment or, more desirably, the prevention of AIDS after a quarter century.

> 'We have transformed AIDS from a death sentence to a chronic, manageable condition'

The McGill science graduate received his PhD from Columbia University in molecular biology in 1972.

He is an observant Jew, who is a member and past president of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem. He wears a kippah when at work at the JGH, although not when he travels.

Wainberg has never been afraid of controversy or expressing his opinion. In an interview with The Canadian Jewish News, he acknowledged the seeming contradiction of a religious person being so deeply identified, not only in researching a disease associated, in part, with what many consider immoral behaviour, but also in vigorously defending the rights of the group most devastated by AIDS – gay men – particularly, the right to marry.

"Promiscuity is without question a key factor in the spread of HIV/AIDS and is not something any of us should condone," he said. "The Bible condemns homosexuality.

"Having said that, I feel strongly that no man or woman has a choice in their sexual orientation. God made them the way they are. I don't know why the Bible is so harsh on homosexuals."

Wainberg supports the legalization of same-sex marriage because "fidelity between partners in the best way to stop the transmission of the disease. From the scientific point of view, it is the way to go. Whether it is morally correct is something the rabbis and ministers and other clergy have to decide."

At the international AIDS conference in Toronto, he criticized Prime Minister Stephen Harper for not attending, calling his absence a lack of leadership and a signal that he does not regard HIV/AIDS as a priority.

"I still feel that way, but I am deeply appreciative of the Harper government in other spheres, such as foreign policy," he said.

Wainberg has not been shy about confronting other politicians, especially African leaders, urging them to face up to the AIDS scourge and be more vocal about the need for prevention, such as condom use.

"Back in 1984 I had no idea my career would take the direction it has. We had no idea how devastating this disease would be."

From the outset, Wainberg believed in the direct link between HIV and AIDS – something that was only a theory for some time – and over the years he has done battle with those who deny that connection.

Wainberg is pleased with the "huge progress" that has been made in the treatment of AIDS with drugs. "We have transformed AIDS from a death sentence to a chronic, manageable condition, much like diabetes. The life expectancy of a 20-year-old man diagnosed today, who gets proper treatment, is not significantly affected.

"You can't say that about cancer."

The McGill AIDS Centre continues its research on various therapies, as well as possible preventive measures such as a vaccine or microbicide that might stop transmission of the virus during sex.

"What a privilege it has been to work these many years at the JGH and McGill, which have nurtured me and always given me support. I cannot imagine a career more rewarding than the one I have had," he said.

No date or place has been set for Wainberg's formal induction into the Légion, but he hopes, if he has a choice, it will take place in France, where the AIDS virus was discovered in 1983 at the Pasteur Institute.

A bar mitzvah amid Olympic medals

By ALISON KLAYMAN
JTA

Isaac Shapiro managed to fit in a visit to the bimah during his busy Olympic schedule in Beijing.

After attending a night of competition at the Bird's Nest, and before seeing American NBA stars blow out world-champion Spain on the basketball court, Isaac was called to the Torah for the first time on Shabbat.

The teenager from Highland Park, Ill., marked the milestone in front of his close family – and a bunch of strangers.

"This shows our children that there is community everywhere," said Isaac's mother, Marjie Shapiro.

Isaac chanted the Maftir and Haftorah in a loud and confident voice even though he was slightly hoarse from cheering at events all week. His humorous dvar Torah, filled with sports references, made the regulars at the Chabad shul in Beijing laugh out loud.

His Torah portion reviewed the Ten Commandments, and his talk emphasized not to worship idols, including "sports heroes," or covet material objects such as his friend's new iPod.

"Instead, I should appreciate my old one," he said.

While Isaac's bar mitzvah was a centrepiece of the Jewish happenings in Beijing during the Olympics, it did not play to the packed house that Chabad Rabbi Shimon Freundlich had predicted. Nor did Dini's, the local kosher eatery that stayed open 24 hours, seven days a week for the Games, find itself overflowing with customers, though business did increase.

Still, for the Shapiro family, the chance to celebrate Isaac's bar mitzvah was a highlight.

"So many people we have met during our trip to China have told us that what we're doing is really special," Shapiro said of her family's decision to stage the simchah during an Olympic trip.

"Other tourists, especially Jews, were really blown away when we told them about the bar mitzvah. Lots of people said it was the best story they'd heard yet in Beijing."

"And for us, even with seeing gymnastics finals and tennis and the U.S. basketball game," the Shabbat morning service "was definitely the highlight of our trip," she said. Her husband, Sam, offered kudos to Freundlich, calling him "really incredible."

The bar mitzvah wasn't special just because of the Olympics or the Bird's Nest-shaped cake at lunch. Isaac also read from the Torah using a yad, or pointer, from the Chabad House's new Chinese Jewish artifacts display. The yad was made in 1903 and used by the Jewish community in Tianjin. Its handle is a large open-mouthed dragon forged with intricate details.

The small exhibit contains other similar ritual objects, including a menorah shaped like a Chinese canal boat from the Shanghai community, letters and other communications from Jews in China. There are books about the Jewish communities of China, and even books in Chinese about how to learn Jewish secrets to financial success.

About 50 people attended the Shabbat service and lunch, although more than half were visitors from the United States, Israel and South Africa. Not all the guests came from far away: One woman was visiting from northern China's Ha'erbin just to feel the Beijing atmosphere during the Games.

The assistant manager at Dini's said the Friday night dinner on Aug. 15 also was less crowded than usual, with only 70 people, including small children.

Despite the Shabbat dip in attendance, Dini's business has risen by 30 to 40 per cent since the Olympics began on Aug. 8.

"Most of the guests are from Israel or America," Willy Wang, the assistant manager, said, "but Chinese people have also been coming. Many are locals who read about the place online and think it's something special, or especially clean and healthy because it's kosher."

Wang said they have been making many deliveries to tourists in hotels. The only delivery to the Olympic village was to Bat-El Getterer, an Israeli taekwondo competitor who is observant.

"She knew she could not survive two weeks in pre-competition training on vegetarian airline food," Freundlich said, so he was able to negotiate a special Dini's delivery for her.

An observant bodyguard with the Israeli delegation noticed the service and asked to be included.

"He was just eating rice," Freundlich said.

The rabbi also doled out 68 challahs in the village for the first week's Shabbat.

Walking around the village, his Chabad attire alluded to his Jewish status, which he said inspired many Jewish athletes or delegation members to introduce themselves.

"The first question everyone asks is, 'What's your event?' "the long-bearded Freundlich joked, grabbing his belly. "I always reply, 'The marathon.'"

Israeli swimmers visit with Chinese schoolchildren

By ALISON KLAYMAN
JTA

Clutching Israeli flags, the young Chinese students greeted the Israeli Olympic swimmers in Beijing with shouts of "shalom" when the athletes visited their elementary school here this week.

The Shi Jia Primary School was assigned Israel as part of a citywide program of partnerships between schools and Olympic countries. In preparation, the school spent the past two years teaching the students about Israel and how to say shalom. It also had the students use Skype to communicate with a school in Jerusalem.

"Many of our students wanted to ask their counterparts in Jerusalem about peace in their region," said English teacher Fu Rui.

"I was very excited when I found out in 2006 that my school would be partnered with Israel; I was really pleased," said principal Zhuo Li, who has been working at the school for 46 years. "Israel is famous around the world for technological and agricultural advancements. They have a small population but they have pushed themselves also in terms of culture and education, with so many people going to school."

Founded in 1939, the Shi Jia school is older than Israel, but this location was newly constructed in 2004 on the site of a temple-style house.

The school, which serves 2,000 students from third through sixth grades, is hidden inside a neighbourhood maze of small alleyways.

As the Israeli contingent was taken on an hour-long tour of the highly fated school, the swimmers' awe grew with each stop. The school features a recording studio and individual piano practice rooms, a large-capacity theatre with a superior tech booth, solar panels and windmills, a dormitory for 300 to 400 students and an underground, mall-like parking garage.

For the Olympians – Itai Chammah, Guy Barnea, Tom Beeri and Gal Nevo – the highlight was the school's first-class sports facilities. Descending into the gymnasium, which had more equipment than many fitness centres, the swimmers pulled out their cameras to take pictures and videos of the children screaming during their fencing lesson.

Chammah, who won a heat in the 200-metre backstroke but failed to qualify for the final, asked Zhuo if he could attend Shi Jia.

"Only if you teach swimming," the principal said with a laugh.

The swimmers were especially in their element at the pool, where the inescapable Beijing Olympic theme song was being pumped over the loudspeaker. A crowd of boys and girls shivered outside the pool for a photo-op for Israeli and Chinese media, and the children looked a bit lacklustre as they posed in their swimsuits.

When the Israeli Embassy spokesperson, Guy Kivetz, told two boys in Chinese what the Israeli swimmers' names were, the children's faces lit up.

"We heard of them!" they cried.

The students began to loosen up, and the swimmers posed with them for another round of pictures where everyone flexed muscles and made funny faces.

Later the athletes answered questions for another group of students. One boy asked why they wanted to become swimmers.

"In my country it's really hot all year round," Beeri replied, "so you only have two choices to cool off – either go into the air conditioning or go to the pool."

The swimmers also advised the students to listen to their coaches, but not to any detractors who might tell them they should pursue other endeavours.

"All of us have been told before that our body type isn't right or we should give up," Chammah said. "You can't listen to those people.

"My coach gave me this advice for competition: first you swim as fast as you can, then you slowly, slowly get faster."

Unfortunately for Chammah and the other Israeli Olympians visiting the school, they weren't fast enough to reach any final. Synchronized swimmers also did not qualify for the finals.

Israel earned its first medal on Wednesday, with windsurfer Shahar Zubari winning the bronze. He came in second in the Men's RS:X medal race to clinch an overall third place finish with 58 net points in Qingdao last Wednesday.

Kayaker Michael Kolganov advanced to the medal race but lost in the semifinals.

At writing, Israel still had competitors in rhythmic gymnastics, taekwondo and the men's long jump.

In tennis, the singles and doubles performers were eliminated early. No shooter advanced and judokas entered repechage rounds without emerging with a bronze medal.

The Israeli athletes who finished competing had flown home by last Tuesday, with the exception of the synchronized swimmers, who were eliminated that day.

After the visit by the Olympians, Zhuo said, "We can learn a lot from the Olympics. Not just from the field of sports, but this can encourage cross-cultural communication. China can learn from the world, and the world can learn from China."

Symbiosis between 'gringos' and villagers

When the Lake Chapala Jewish Congregation went out looking for cemetery land, we explained the Jewish burial requirements to the Mexican officials. They not only understood but eagerly informed us that villagers also bury their dead within two days.

I remember walking by a home where some 50 chairs were put out on the street for family and friends to pay their respects in shivah-like fashion. I, a stranger passing by, paid my respects with a traditional "los sientos" (my sympathies). Everything is communal and out on the street, raw and open to the entire village – weddings, holidays, parties and even death.

A perfect example of a modern manifestation of an ancient Aztec tradition, and often misrepresented, is the Day of the Dead. Mistakenly characterized as similar to Halloween, the Day of the Dead could more accurately be likened to an aboriginal fusion of Yizkor and Purim – all wrapped in a flimsy Catholic disguise.

Like Yizkor, it is a sacred day reserved for remembering those who passed away. Homemade shrines with pictures of the deceased, fronted by plates piled high with their favourite food, are set up in front of every home. After days of preparation, villagers descend on the cemeteries to pay homage – just as Jews do before Rosh Hashanah. Here, however, the similarity ends. Carrying baskets brimming with their loved ones' favourite foods, families actually picnic at gravesites, which are elaborately decorated with flowers and photos.

They celebrate the deceased's lives with an irreverence that, while accepting the inevitability of death and tragedy, levels an ironic wink and collective finger at the Angel of Death with a "you can't scare us" chutzpah. Here too, as on Purim, the intrepid mariachis – just like our klezmoriam did – leave their soulful musical mark. Revelry ends the day with the triumph of survival and life. We drink to blur the line between Haman and Mordechai. They feast to blur the line between life and death.

While there are comparisons between Ajijic and the European shtetl, there are thankfully differences as well. First of all, Ajijic is much more prosperous than most Mexican villages or their eastern European counterparts. This is not only because Americans and Canadians have descended in droves over the past 20 years but also because the area around Lake Chapala has always been the "Muskoka" for wealthy Guadalajarans, many of whom have lavish villas there. Consequently, now more than ever, the locals enjoy full employment and a relatively high standard of living.

Unlike the religious antagonisms of the shtetl, there is symbiosis between the "gringos" and villagers. Along with the growing number of expats, modernity has come to Ajijic in the form of high quality shops, galleries and restaurants. Even Wal-Mart is raising its dubious head there. Economic prosperity has resulted in a growing middle class with more professionals, private schools, access to higher education, consumer goods and other benefits of modern life. By being exposed to so many expats who bring different traditions, cultures and lifestyles into their midst, the villagers have gained as much financially as those who choose to spend their retirement years there have gained in wisdom and a new outlook on life.

Despite these changes, like the Jews, the locals have managed to preserve their unique culture and hold onto their time-honoured traditions. I'm convinced that Ajijic will continue to be the sunny Mexican shtetl that Jews can comfortably and safely retire in.

FALL 2008 LECTURE SERIES AT HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

Telling the Zionist Story Anew
Israel Explains Itself to the World

When much of the world de-legitimizes Zionism and the State of Israel — now more than ever — Jews and our friends are required to tell the story of the Jewish State; to tell of its history and values; to tell of the dignity Zionism imbued in the Jewish People; to tell of the progressive nature of the State of Israel and the Zionist movement that brought everything about. We will be fortunate to host the following prominent figures who will tell the Zionist story each in his own way. All lectures will take place on Wednesdays at 8 p.m.

Will a new Cold War play out in the Middle East?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

When Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert goes from Jerusalem to Moscow later this month, his first order of business will be to make sure the Russians don't sell sophisticated new weaponry to Syria that could alter the military status quo in the Middle East.

Late last month, Syrian President Bashar Assad visited Russia to make a pitch for the arms, new anti-aircraft missiles and ground-to-ground rockets that would put all of the Jewish state within range of Damascus.

Though Russia rejected the request, the Russians apparently are prepared to sell Syria other anti-aircraft missiles, state-of-the-art anti-tank missiles and fighter planes.

In January 2005, Vladimir Putin – then Russia's president and now its prime minister – promised Israel not to sell arms that might upset the strategic balance in the Middle East. So far, Putin has kept that promise.

But with talk of a new Cold War in the offing following Russia's military successes in Georgia last month, Israel is worried Russia might reassess this policy and use the sale of new weaponry to Syria – or the threat of it – to strengthen Russia's hand vis-a-vis Israel's primary ally, the United States.

Some experts are concerned that the growing clash between Russian and U.S. interests will prompt Moscow to feel freer to sell its arms to countries outside the U.S. orbit that also happen to be hostile to Israel.

The worst-case scenario, experts say, is that Russia would revert to its Soviet role as Middle East spoiler, fanning the flames of conflict and undermining peace efforts.

Most say, however, that Russia will always stop short of direct confrontation – and the Georgia episode hasn't changed this approach.

Analysis

"There is no way the Russians are going back to the Cold War or anything like it," one Israeli official told JTA on the condition of anonymity.

But Itamar Rabinovich, a former Israeli ambassador to the United States who is now at Tel Aviv University, argues that Russia has emerged much stronger from its Georgia campaign and that this will have repercussions for the Middle East.

In Rabinovich's view, U.S.-Russian co-operation on Iran is now far less likely, and Russian arms sales to Iran and Syria are much more likely.

Israeli analysts say the Russian military industry long has been pushing for unrestricted weapons sales, but Putin has been wary of selling weapons that could spark regional flare-ups and involve Russia in head-to-head conflict with the West.

In the past, Russia has refrained from selling strategic weapons like the Iskander-E ground-to-ground rocket or the S-300 anti-aircraft missile to Syria.

The Iskander is far more accurate than the Scud rockets currently in the Syrian arsenal and could pinpoint any target in Israel from Haifa to Eilat. The S-300 has a range of 125 miles and can handle 36 targets at once. Deployed in Damascus, it could threaten aircraft deep inside Israeli airspace.

With Moscow emboldened after its dramatic success in Georgia, some Israeli analysts worry these weapons eventually could find their way to Damascus.

On August 12, Vazha and Irina Mamisashvili and their two sons, Nikolotz, 8, and David, 5, arrived as new immigrants at Ben Gurion Airport, brought by the Jewish Agency for Israel from Georgia at the height of the war. They are now living on Kibbutz Masada, in the Jordan Valley, far from their apartment building in the outskirts of Tbilisi, which was nearly hit by a Russian missile.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hitler comparison

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) is calling for civilized political discourse in the aftermath of an incident in which Prime Minister Stephen Harper was compared to Nazi dictator Adolf Hitler during a demonstration by Quebec artists angered by government cuts to arts funding. "The comparison of Canada's Prime Minister to Nazi leader Adolf Hitler is obscene and offensive," said Frank Dimant, BBC's executive vice-president. "Such statements trivialize the Holocaust and inject ugly rhetoric in what ought to be reasoned debate on real and pressing political issues."

Water symposium

WINNIPEG — A dozen Israeli water experts met with an equal number of counterparts from Manitoba recently in the first-ever Manitoba-Israel Water Experts Symposium. The meeting was initiated by Manitoba's Minister of Water Stewardship, Christine Melnick, and Jewish National Fund world chair Eli Stenzler. A followup conference in Israel is planned for next year.

WORLD

Convention speaker

WASHINGTON — David Flaum, the chair of the Republican Jewish Coalition, will address the GOP convention on the same night as presidential candidate John McCain. "Flaum's participation in the GOP convention program is another example of the high priority the GOP gives to the issues of importance to the Jewish community and another indicator of the continued inroads the GOP is making amongst Jewish voters," said the RJC's executive director, Matt Brooks. Several polls suggest McCain could do better with Jewish voters than recent Republican candidates.

Hezbollah TV

MELBOURNE — An Arab member of Australia's Indonesia-based al-Manar TV station, "in the context of the 'crimes of the State of Israel,' to portray Israeli rabbis as killing Christian children to use their blood in Passover meals." Jabbar told the newspaper, The Age, that while he would not call Jews the offspring of apes and pigs, it was reasonable for al-Manar to do so. According to Jabbour, the station, which transmits by satellite, is popular among Arabic speakers in Australia.

Greening initiative

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement has lead-free wicks and recyclable tins. A third prong is encouraging community support for carbon offset programs. The programs involve planting trees, cleaning rivers and performing other environmentally sustainable actions. The fourth component is using biodegradable building and food service supplies. A joint purchasing agreement is in place to help Conservative institutions buy such products in bulk instead of non-reusable plates, cups and utensils. "Being green is a Jewish imperative," said Rabbi Charles Simon, the executive director of the men's club federation.

Dead Sea Scrolls going digital

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Antiquities Authority announced that scientists are working on a project to use high-powered digital cameras to digitize the Dead Sea Scrolls and upload them to the Internet, making thousands of scroll fragments available to the public online.

The scrolls will be imaged in colour and in infrared, which will allow the reading of scroll fragments that were blackened or faded and not visible to the naked eye.

The scrolls, which are more than 2,000 years old, were discovered in 1947 in a cave near the Dead Sea by Bedouin shepherds. They are the most ancient Hebrew record of the Old Testament discovered to date.

The digitization project is led by Greg Bearman, who recently retired from the NASA Jet Propulsion Laboratory. Simon Tanner of Kings College London, who has worked with some of the oldest artifacts around the world and helped numerous digital projects succeed in delivering public and scholarly access to their treasures, is directing data collection.

The project is expected to take about two years.

Consulate reaches out to secular Israelis for holidays

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, is launching an outreach effort to bring together the GTA's secular Israeli and local Jewish communities for this year's High Holidays.

Amir Gissin

At a meeting at the consulate last week, Gissin told about 20 synagogue and Israeli community representatives that he was inspired by an Israeli project called Yom Kippur L'Kulam (Yom Kippur for Everybody).

Rabbi Michael Melchior, then Israel's minister of the Diaspora, initiated it for secular Israelis with minimal exposure to synagogue, Judaism or Jewish communal life.

Its Yom Kippur services, which began in five synagogues and has expanded, offered a "friendly environment" and an educational component.

Gissin wants to establish a similar program because children of Israelis here are being lost "not just to the Jewish people [but] to Israel." As far as he knows, it's the first time the program, or a form of it, will be used outside of Israel.

Synagogue and prayer can be 'intimidating'

For Israelis without close ties to Judaism, going to synagogue here is intimidating or costly, he said.

But for some of them, Yom Kippur synagogue attendance is "an important feature of their life, even if that's the one connection they have to Jewish communal life."

Gissin said there is "a very strong core" of the GTA's estimated 60,000-plus Israelis integrated into Jewish life, citing 800 Israeli day school teachers as an example. "We're not talking about all Israelis; we're talking about those we're about to lose."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah said the initiative is "something many of us have thought about for years."

Rabbi Michal Shekel, executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, said she was glad about the initiative because she'd spent the summer talking about outreach to Israelis. She said she hoped the meeting would result in contact with Israeli organizations that could help.

Gissin said there are many cultural differences between Israelis and Canadian Jews. Several attendees mentioned the fact that tickets are required for entry to virtually all synagogues here on the High Holidays.

Rabbi Yisroel Landa – spiritual leader of the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre in Thornhill, which serves the Israeli community – said that Israelis feel if a guard at the door asks for tickets, "in their mind this is not a synagogue... this is a movie theatre."

Rabbi Harvey Meirovich, who will be at Beth Tzedec Congregation for the coming year and who has taught secular Israelis in Jerusalem, said that in his experience, secular Israelis find tefillah (prayer) intimidating or irrelevant. However, he added, they are drawn to synagogue on Yom Kippur seeking a spiritual connection and asking "the tough questions we all ask... about life and its meaning.

Gil Koren – director of national sales for the Ethnic Channels Group, umbrella to 12 ethnic channels including one in Hebrew – said that while it's important to reach out to Israeli kids, "you have to target the parents" as well. Koren, who immigrated here four years ago, grew up in South Africa and lived in Israel for nine years.

Nir Sela – former director of the Israeli House, a division of the consulate – told The CJN that two years ago he received about 20 inquiries about High Holiday services from Israelis here.

Essential to cover both sides of story

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On Aug. 25, Israel freed almost 200 Palestinian prisoners. The event got a fair amount of media attention but not all reports told the full story.

In "Release of Palestinian prisoners a 'good step' but Rice warns against rushing peace process," (Globe and Mail, Aug. 26) Orly Halpern described the release of 198 Palestinian prisoners as an Israeli "concession to its negotiating partners."

Halpern wrote: "Israel hoped the move would boost the popularity of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who is struggling for popular support as the peace process continues and a peace agreement remains elusive."

Among the released prisoners were two who had murdered Israeli civilians and had been sentenced to life in prison. As in the recent prisoner exchange that saw Israel release the notorious murderer Samir Kuntar, once again, Israel departed from its policy of not freeing those with "blood on their hands."

In an Aug. 25 CBC.ca article titled "Israel releases almost 200 Palestinian prisoners," Israeli government spokesman Mark Regev said that it wasn't easy for Israel to release the prisoners.

"Some of the individuals being released today are guilty of direct involvement in the murder of innocent civilians," Regev said.

"But we understand the importance of the prisoner issue for Palestinian society… We believe this action can support the negotiation process and create goodwill."

The news reports all described the joyous reception that greeted the busloads of released prisoners returning to the West Bank.

And, as Halpern wrote, Abbas was also there to greet them:

"'The release of this group fills us with joy,' Mr. Abbas told the crowd at a jubilant welcoming ceremony in Ramallah. 'But we will not be satisfied until all prisoners are released, the 11,000 who are still waiting.'"

But in an Aug. 26 article titled "Israel Frees 198 Palestinians Before Rice Arrives for Talks," Isabel Kershner of the New York Times wrote that Israeli authorities estimate that "about 9,000 Palestinian prisoners remain in Israel's jails."

Israel's efforts to bolster Abbas did not begin with this latest gesture.

Kershner added that about "1,000 prisoners, mostly from Fatah and a few from leftist groups, have been released in four rounds since Hamas took control of Gaza."

The prisoner release took place just ahead of a visit to Israel by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Halpern wrote that Rice "hailed the release as 'a very good step'" but "warned against rushing the process… Her words echoed those of Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who last week said that 'premature' efforts to bridge gaps could lead to 'clashes.'"

Halpern described the "gaps" as involving such final status issues as "control of Jerusalem, borders and the [Palestinian] return of refugees."

Halpern then placed the onus on Israel for failing to make progress.

"The process has been complicated by renewed Israeli settlement expansion as well as political uncertainty due to [Israeli Prime Minister] Mr. [Ehud] Olmert's corruption scandal. Ms. Rice has spoken firmly against settlement expansion and urged Israel to allow Palestinians more freedom of movement."

To be fair, Halpern needs to also address the Palestinian obligation to dismantle terror organizations. Israel cannot be expected to operate and make concessions in a vacuum.

For example, along with mentioning the settlement controversy, the CBC.ca report also drew attention to Israel's security concerns.

"Israel has condemned rocket and mortar attacks fired into its territory by Palestinian militants in Gaza, although such attacks have been reduced drastically since Israel and militant Islamist group Hamas agreed to an Egyptian-brokered ceasefire in June."

Israel also faces daily terrorist threats from a variety of West Bank militant groups that Abbas, for the most part, has been unwilling or unable to rein in. Responsible, accurate reporting demands attention to this major lapse on the Palestinian side.

COMING HOME TO ISRAEL:

Two flights landing at Ben-Gurion Airport last week brought some 290 new immigrants to Israel from the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, making aliyah under the Nefesh b'Nefesh immigrant organization, which has brought more than 2,000 North American and British olim to Israel this year. One more immigrant flight is scheduled to shortly arrive from North America, the last of five specially chartered Nefesh b'Nefesh flights this summer. Last week's immigrants come from 17 different U.S. states and two Canadian provinces.

Brand Israel campaign launched

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A pilot project to burnish Israel's image kicks off this week and will piggy back on the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) to get the program international exposure.

Though the launch of Brand Israel was not specifically timed to coincide with the TIFF, the endeavour will leverage the presence of journalists from around the world to send out a message that something important is happening in Toronto, said Israeli consul general Amir Gissin.

"It signals to the world we are on the map and doing something big," he said.

Gissin introduced the branding effort at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre last week. The pilot project will last 10 months and is aimed at shifting the public's focus on Israel away from political conflict to other aspects of the country, particularly the contributions Israelis make to improve Torontonians' quality of life. It will feature bus shelter ads and billboards highlighting Israeli scientific achievements, including a life-saving coronary stent.

> 'We just want Canadians to be aware of Israel's contribution and relevancy to their lives'

"We just want Canadians to be aware of Israel's contribution and relevancy to their lives," Gissin stated. "If someone is more relevant to your life, you are more aware of it and care about it more."

The campaign is not limited to one particular area, he continued. Israeli contributions in medical advances, technological innovations, cultural matters, even sports and music will be made known to Canadians, Gissin said.

"Israel's image is not just important. Israel's bad image and problem brand has become a burden on our society," Gissin stated.

In the past, Israelis have failed to sell the country adequately, he continued. Faced with opponents' attempts to brand Israel – most recently as an apartheid state – Israelis have responded by counter arguments to explain why Israel is not racist, he said.

That approach is inadequate because branding is about more than facts and data. It is about emotions. Re-branding Israel will complement the hasbarah (advocacy) work being done.

"We have a very good product called Israel and we need to sell it," Gissin added.

An improved image of Israel would pay off in increased tourism, foreign investment and exports, not to mention helping Israelis feel better about themselves, he said.

Gissin noted the branding campaign is relying heavily on co-operation with friends in the local community.

The work done by market researchers, pollsters and other supporters is being done pro bono. In addition, campaign spokespeople are asking grassroots supporters of Israel to personally assist the effort. That could simply mean referring friends and colleagues to innovations in their fields pioneered in Israel.

Larry Weinberg, executive vice-president of Israel21C, a website that features non-political stories from Israel, said he referred a surgeon he met at a dinner party to a recent Israeli medical innovation.

The surgeon learned about a new technique, adding value to his work and leading him to think of Israel in an entirely new way, Weinberg said.

American focus groups demonstrated to researchers that they view Israel as a place of conflict and religion.

"We need a third lens, a human lens," Weinberg said. "We have to stop talking about Israel as 'it,' but as 'them'."

The overarching message is that "every day the lives of Canadians are made easier, safer, more efficient and better by innovations and contributions of Israelis," he added.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto spokesperson Howard English said the organization will lend "strategic support and consultation and will stand behind the project all the way."

Branding Israel can be seen as presenting a more complete picture of the country.

"A composite picture of a nation is always more attractive than a one-dimensional view," he said.

A benchmark survey will reveal Torontonians' attitudes about Israel before the campaign launches and another will measure it in three months. Subsequent surveys will gauge changes in attitudes.

Gissin said the results will be presented to government officials and if successful, budget allocations should follow. So far the campaign is relying largely on donated services from local partners, which Gissin valued at $1 million over the next 10 months. A modest allocation from the Israeli government is earmarked for research purposes, he added.

After 10 months, the pilot project will be evaluated.

"We'll study it to see what works and what doesn't work."

Those elements that prove successful could then be employed in other cities around the world, he said.

Worth watching

The President of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was in the news last week again spilling his venom onto the flag of Israel. Speaking to a similarly venomous hater of Israel, Farouk Kaddoumi, the head of the PLO's political department, he observed that "The Zionist regime has always shown that aside from the language of guns, it does not know any other language."

No doubt Ahmadinejad felt spritely buoyed by the sense of increasing uncertainty in the integrity of oil supplies, especially to Europe, created by the ongoing instability in the Caucasus region. He probably also felt smug over the very public display by Russia of its talks with his quasi-client state, Syria, concerning the possible resumption of Russian military systems to Syria and the use of Syrian port facilities by the Russian navy.

Regional instability, he calculates, works in his country's favour as does the possibility of a heightened Russian presence in the area, which presumably would be to the displeasure and consternation of Israel and the U.S. What is displeasing to Israel and America, of course, is quite contrarily very pleasing to him.

But his pleasures may be short lived. Early in the new year, Ahmadinejad must stand for re-election. And while the outcome might be foreordained, there are very clear signs that he does not enjoy the favour of all of his countrymen.

According to reports in the JTA, Iranian Grand Ayatollah Bajat Sanjani called Ahmadinejad "a major threat" to the Iranian people and encouraged the country's reformers to defeat him in elections next year. In an interview in the German Financial Times Deutschland, Sanjani accused Ahmadinejad's government of breaking the law, seriously encroaching on existing freedoms, and illegally empowering the Revolutionary Guard. Indeed, so frequent has been criticism of Ahmadinejad by Iranians inside Iran, that supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, felt compelled to defend his president and his quirky, failed policies.

Those policies essentially forsake the domestic needs of his own people and blame, Israel, his favourite scapegoat, for the suffering of Iranian people.

About the scurrilous, dangerous nature of that scapegoating, The Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center in Israel recently wrote the following: "Throughout the Middle East and the entire world, Iran stands out as the only country to make deliberate, intensive use of 'the weapon of anti-Semitism,' combined with a genocidal policy which seeks to destroy Israel... That characteristic of its policy makes Iran markedly different from other Arab and Muslim countries, which avoid jumping on the Iranian policy bandwagon, and from every other country in the world. In fact, Iran is the first country since Nazi Germany which officially embraces an active policy of anti-Semitism as a means to promote its national objectives."

The upcoming Iranian election is worth watching, even as Ahmadinejad's anti-Israel national objectives are worth defeating.

Placing the argument in context

Your newspaper does its readers a disservice by not adequately detailing a contributor's biography. Rabbi David Golinkin ("'Who is a Jew?' debate returns," CJN Perspectives, July 31) is merely identified at the end of the article as the president of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies. It would have been helpful to have mentioned that this institute is aligned with the Conservative Movement. Then we would have a context for understanding Rabbi Golinkin's criticism of the recent ruling of the High Rabbinical Court of the Chief Rabbinate of Israel that certain conversions are retroactively annulled.

Aside from Rabbi Golinkin's inaccurate halachic analysis, he omits a fundamental premise of the halachic process, namely, the reliance on authoritative halachic personalities. Of the two lists of rabbis that he categorized into so-called "strict" and "lenient," it is most obvious which list would be considered as rabbis of a stature who would command almost universal acceptance as halachic decisors. The rabbis of the "strict" list do indeed embody what journalist Jonathan Rosenbloom characterized as "the overwhelming consensus of halachic opinion."

Moreover, Rabbi Golinkin glosses over that rabbinical court's Rabbi Avraham Sherman himself, and some of the names on the "strict" list, are far from being one-dimensionally haredi. And one stands incredulous that Rabbi Golinkin would invoke the Israeli Supreme Court as qualified to overturn decisions of the rabbinate in matters of Halachah.

What is most telling of the deficiencies of Rabbi Golinkin's article is his "social" analysis. The misguided policy of bringing so many non-Jewish Russians into Israel under the Law of Return is indeed an intractable problem. Nevertheless, that does not give the secular institutions of the state any licence to intervene in halachic issues of conversion to solve a social problem, a problem that is of their own making.

This is why a biography of Rabbi Golinkin, no matter how short, should have included his affiliation.

Israel won't be accepted as a Jewish state

The Muslim denial of the historicity of the Temple Mount as Judaism's central religious location is very disturbing ("Muslim denial of Jewish links to Temple Mount is the biggest barrier to peace," CJN Perspectives, July 10). It is, however, readily explained. It is parallel to the Qur'an's substitution of Ishmael for Isaac in the story of the Akedah (the binding of Isaac).

Author Bernard Lewis explains what is surely obvious – that the selection of the Dome of the Rock "on the site of the ancient Jewish Temple and in the style and the vicinity of Christian monuments such as the Holy Sepulchre and the Church of the Ascension, sent a clear message to the Jews, and more important, to the Christians." The message was one of supersession: these faiths were replaced by Islam.

Yitzhak Reiter, in this article, claims that this "denial" is the biggest barrier to peace. I take issue with this view. The overriding barrier to peace, in my opinion, is the extraordinary mindset that underlies this denial. It involves two components. One is the demonization of the Jew. The second Arab/Islamic factor is psychological and ideological in nature. Factual truth emanates from what is deemed to be ideological truth. If Islamic ideology requires that the Jewish claim of historical connection to the land of Israel, to Jerusalem and to the Temple and its site, be deemed false, then that becomes historical fact.

At the beginning of his article, Leiter suggests that the other "issues" separating Israel and the Palestinians/Arabs can be resolved. Not from what I see. The Palestinians have said they will demand from Israel that the principle of their right of return be agreed upon in writing. And all Palestinian leaders have said that the only agreement they would adhere to will be with a "generic" Israel, not a Jewish one. They will not accept Israel as a Jewish state.

Putting aside the question of other Arabs, are Israel's Arab citizens ready to accept the country as a Jewish state? Absolutely not. Prof. Moshe Sharon of the Hebrew University and Dan Schueften, deputy director of the National Security Studies Center at the University of Haifa, have both written on this subject. Sharon has said that "we must understand that the goal of all Arab peace initiatives is the same – the liquidation of the State of Israel. There is no Arab initiative that is not Islamic in essence."

Reuven Rubin: an artist's life

By BARUCH COHEN

"Whoever wants to see Eretz Yisrael, the land and what comes with it in its supreme purity, let him turn to the artistic creation of Rubin!"

-Chaim Nachman Bialik

Reuven Rubin was born in Galatz, Romania, in November 1893 and was drawing as far back as he could remember. At the age of two, he used a shard to sketch a man's head on a square red brick. In the cheder, where he was sent by his parents to acquire a Jewish education, he indulged in his irrepressible urge to cover the whitewashed walls of the school room with his drawings.

His parents, Joel and Fany Zelicovici, were barely able to feed and clothe their large family, yet young Rubin was sent to the local school of commerce. At age 15, he had to leave school in order to make a living as a junior accountant.

After working for several firms, he found himself dreaming and drawing caricatures of customers and fellow employees. Steeped in Zionist feelings and Jewish folklore, at 18, he ran away from this boring, sleepy, dull life and work.

Reuven Rubin, a self-portrait

Rubin left Galatz and set out on a journey that, at the time, was still a dream fraught with danger and adventure. It was a dream of fulfilment in a new land: Eretz Yisrael. He found Palestine a backward Turkish province with only a few agricultural settlements, but for him it was the Land of Israel.

In Jerusalem in 1912, he enrolled in Bezalel Academy of Art and Design, founded by Prof. Boris Schatz, but he soon found himself at odds with the artistic views of the academy and its teachers.

He left for Paris in 1913 to pursue his studies at the École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux-Arts. In 1914, at the outbreak of World War I, he was obliged to leave Paris and return to his native Romania. He left Paris in the years when artist Chaim Soutine came from Vilna, Emmanuel Mane-Katz from Kiev, and Amedeo Modigliani and Jules Pascin were already well established.

The war years and a few postwar years were a period of restlessness. He spent his time at museums and art galleries in Florence and Rome. In Berne, Switzerland, he discovered one of the now forgotten modernists, Ferdinand Hodler, and through him, he learned to grasp the significance of a greater man, Paul Cezanne. As Rubin himself said: "Cezanne and Holden freed me: the first giving me the possibility of construction in colour, the second teaching me the element of form [mostly of the human body] in space."

After the war, in 1919, he went to Cernovitz in Romania. There he met the painter Arthur Kolnik, with whom he shared a lonely existence. During these years, his paintings The Prophet Among the World Weary and Madonna of the Homeless, reflected his suffering.

Arriving in New York in 1921, he met noted art patron Alfred Stieglitz, who appreciated Rubin's talent and recommended him to the Anderson Gallery for his first show. The exhibition was a success and marked his acceptance as a professional artist.

In the New York Herald Tribune, art critic Emily Genauer described Rubin's drawings as full of dynamic movement, yet simultaneously so perceptive and sensitive as to bring to mind nothing less than certain sketches by Rembrandt.

The New York American wrote: "Think of such an apocalyptic artist opening a show in materialistic New York with the idea of possibly selling some of his pictures. It is preposterous and yet it is sublime. The very audacity of faith and despair may triumph at that."

In the Sunday World, this graphic description of the painter appeared: "Tall, gaunt, with a wave of black hair, incandescent black eyes, sideburns down his hollow cheeks, and a small, thin round mouth, Rubin reminds us of the bullfighters painted by [Ignacio] Zuloaga. He speaks as if tormented by some distress and his painted words burn like a stream of lava."

In 1923, Rubin returned to Eretz Yisrael and attempted to create a new, original Eretz Yisrael style. He had a one-man show in Tel Aviv at the Herzliah gymnasium. The Hebrew press hailed it as a new trend in creative art in the country. The painting First Fruits later came to be seen as a document representing the epoch when pioneers brought forth the first fruits in the ancient land.

In 1924, Rubin held an exhibition that was revolutionary in every way. The Palestine Weekly described the opening thus: "The exhibition was a pleasant surprise to the Jerusalem public, which never before witnessed anything approaching this new trend of creative art. This exhibition places Rubin in a class by himself." The exhibition was under the patronage of and supported by the British governor of Jerusalem at the Citadel of David.

Rubin held his first exhibition in Paris in 1925, and was introduced by the essayist and poet Edmond Fleg. Jewish themes were found in such canvases as Succoth in Jerusalem and Sabbath in the Colony.

Rubin's works displayed a personality that seemed serene and without inner conflict, and he himself explained: "I am a Jew and an artist in my own country. I felt calm and at ease."

This contentment was reflected in his paintings. "Here in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, in Haifa, Tiberias, I feel myself reborn, here life and nature are mine, the grey clouds of Europe have disappeared, my suffering and the war are ended. All is sunshine, clear light and happy creative work."

In 1929 at Rubin's show in Paris at the Druet Gallery, the critic Jean Topez, writing in Chronique et Documents, wrote of "a new Hebrew primitivism with Hebrew sources, authentically of this promised land – promised and refound."

The Divine Spirit Returns to Jerusalem*, a painting by Reuven Rubin

Citing other works, the Topez writes: "I would say that with Reuven Rubin, the 'Palestine Style' has been born."

Rubin loved to travel. He made numerous trips to the desert, to the city of Petra, to Aqaba, and to the Red Sea, where he was captivated by the incredible colours.

He was constantly experimenting, always seeking fresh effects, and he never lost interest in the manipulation of paint. His paintings attest to his warm, emotional nature and his mastery over the techniques of painting. After more than a half century in Israel, Rubin had seen his country rebuilt and flourishing, his people reborn, proud and strong. It can be said that he served his people and his country well.

In 1948, the State of Israel was born, and Rubin was appointed as the first Israel ambassador to his native Romania, a position he held until 1950.

"When the foreign minister, Moshe Sharet, called me that I was appointed to become the first Israeli ambassador to Romania, I was astonished. I did not know what to answer! I cannot answer on the spot. It is so unexpected. I'll go home and think.

"After giving the matter considerable thought, I told Moshe Sharet that I would be pleased to accept the appointment and serve my country and my people. The appointment represented an important milestone in my life. I had left the land of my birth poor, a struggling, would-be painter and I was about to return to it as an accredited representative of the new state. It was a unique, extraordinary moment for me."

What Theodor Herzl dreamed, Rubin gave life to in his paintings. The flourishing, renewed Yishuv is recognized in Rubin's work. The spirit of utopian, Zionist idealism is alive in his paintings, a vibrant vision of the future. The new Jew stands tall, proud and tanned against the Eretz Yisrael landscape, an image of the biblical Garden of Eden.

Reuven Rubin died in Tel Aviv in October 1974. His home was in Tel Aviv, at 14 Bialik St. A group of his paintings were bequeathed to the city of Tel Aviv and his home is now the Reuven Rubin Museum.

In his book My Life, My Art, Rubin writes: "In Tel Aviv, I discovered Caesarea, the shores of the Mediterranean – ruins of an ancient past filled the unspoiled natural beauty of the place. And on a hill overlooking the old Roman aqueduct, I built my dream house and studio. And thus, yearnings expressed in my youth poems over 50 years ago, finally come true:

"Oh shores of sea, I build thee my home,/ To wash your tired feet,/ In golden foam of greens and blues..."

Baruch Cohen is research chair of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research in Montreal.

Opinions

What is naches?

Getting naches is the great parental quest. For immigrant Jews, naches – which means parental joy – was defined by four simple words: "my son the doctor." Unfortunately, this parental obsession gives a distorted picture of the parent-child relationship.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Pushing a child in order to provide the parent with pride can have destructive consequences. Elisha, a second-century rabbi, is chosen by his father, Abuya, to become a rabbi so that Abuya could impress others with his son's ability. Elisha does become a great rabbi, but in an era of Roman persecutions, he crumbles and becomes a heretic. Elisha's studies left his soul empty, because they were intended to impress his father.

This uglier side of "getting naches" is what psychologists call "achievement by proxy syndrome." A parent sees his child, the prodigy, as a ticket to greatness. The parent-child relationship is then reduced to a puppet show, with the child dancing to the tune of the parent's dreams. In the end, achievement by proxy syndrome leads to a multitude of dysfunctions.

Some parents even quit their own careers in order to manage their children's "talent." The child ends up paying dearly for a childhood in a pressure cooker; indeed, actor Macaulay Culkin and tennis player Jennifer Capriati are poster children for the excesses of achievement by proxy syndrome.

True naches is not about getting, it's about giving. The real joy in parenting comes from being a true parent. And a parent's greatest role is as a teacher.

Randy Pausch was a college professor and father of three young children, who got pancreatic cancer in the summer of 2006. He returned to university to give one final lecture that became a bestselling book called The Last Lecture. Pausch explains in the foreword to the book that the lecture was his way of "bottling" the life lessons he wanted to impart to his children as they grew up.

Pausch's book was an exercise in true naches; it's a dying father's way of giving his children a legacy of authentic wisdom.

Most importantly, naches is about love. Parents transform the lives of their children through dedication and devotion. And the parents that do this the most are the parents of the developmentally disabled. Unfortunately, they often stand alone in their efforts.

Until recently, a child with cognitive impairments didn't have a bar or bat mitzvah. Synagogues were too rigid and formal to accommodate the needs of the developmentally disabled. But that is changing.

In Boston, a program called Gateways has enabled dozens of developmentally disabled children to have their own innovative bar and bat mitzvahs. I have been involved in several bar and bat mitzvahs like this, and at the ceremony, there are powerful emotions in the air. You can sense the love, you can sense the family's dedication, and as the bar mitzvah finishes his carefully rehearsed presentation, you can sense something else, as well:

Authentic naches.

Our exotic grandparents

Some of us belong to a secret society in North America. Although we look like everybody else and pass for normal, we share an unspoken bond, a hidden birthmark, which imparts an enduring sense of otherness. In the Jewish community, our numbers are dwindling, although they are replenished regularly. We are the League of People with Exotic Grandparents.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Not so long ago, almost every North American Jew had one – an immigrant parent or grandparent with a thick accent and foreign manners, comically clueless about the American way of life. Today, as the heroic generation of eastern European immigrants that built the American Jewish community dies out, our third- and fourth-generation Americanized children lack this living link to the past. Moreover, many with exotic parents or grandparents are embarrassed by them.

To be fair, being ashamed of "greenhorn" elders is a longstanding North American – and Jewish – tradition. It is a staple of the American dream literature of yesteryear wherein the plucky hero rises up from impoverished surroundings and displaced, overworked and impotent parents. But, today, watching a thoroughly assimilated, frequently privileged "millennial" squirm at the foreignness of his or her forbears, it is the youngster who appears impoverished.

I feel blessed by my intimate association with my late Polish-born maternal grandfather who lived to be 100 years old, and by my Romanian-born in-laws. My wife and I, and now, our children, are lucky to have that visceral connection with European Jewry's lost world. In fact, this connection only makes us more American, more Canadian, for what could be more all-American than the immigrant experience of building a life in the New World?

Living in Montreal has connected me far more intensely – and intimately – to this immigrant generation. Growing up in New York, most of my friends' parents were American-born, products of the eastern European migration that began in the 1880s and ended with the immigration restrictions of the 1920s. Most of my Jewish peers had parents who spoke a flawless – if New-York-inflected – English. In Montreal – where the Jewish community grew substantially after the Holocaust, I met more peers with immigrant parents, meaning our children can join the League of People with Exotic Grandparents. Of course, many of the immigrants are Sephardi and, yes, grandparents like my parents – and parents like my wife and me – can pass on Jewish identity just fine, thank you very much. Still, those heavily accented European refugees add a delicious spice, a deeper sense of ethnic connection, and often a more tragic but dramatic and inspiring history.

I recently addressed a leadership conference for Jewish leaders 45 and younger. Some participants bemoaned what they called the today's "non-Jewish Jews." I usually avoid this phrase, as being too judgmental, too final, too heavy-handed. But I knew exactly what these young leaders meant.

The lures of America and Canada are so great, it is easy to "pass" as "normal," to become North American pagans. Whereas previous generations of Jews struggle to join the social mainstream, our peers – and certainly our juniors – join effortlessly. In fact, it often takes a lot more work, a lot more gumption, to "do Jewish." It is hard to follow tradition in a world of the here and now. It is hard to believe in God in a society that mocks believers. It is hard to embrace abstractions in a culture of consumerism and materialism.

Yet, who are we if we have no memory, no links to the past, no guidance from our heritage? What kind of people are we if we abandon core beliefs because they are not fashionable? And what will become of us if we lack deeper values, transcendent visions, soaring ideals?

Our exotic grandparents help remind us of another world, of a rich past, of our tribal connection. They happily left that world because of its rampant anti-Semitism and epidemic poverty. And even in their hamhanded way, they embraced the American and Canadian way of life. As their heirs – whether or not we ever met that generation – we need to honour their sacrifices, appreciate their achievements and champion their legacies, even as we delight in the broad acceptance we feel in this most welcoming corner of the world.

Voting the faith

My maternal grandfather, my zaide, was a fervent mitnaged who lived in a predominantly chassidic neighborhood in Brooklyn. Although not a socialist, he worked for a Yiddish socialist daily newspaper. His religious and political commitments did not prevent him from having cordial relationships with his neighbours and co-workers. He davened in a Williamsburg shul with other mitnagdim, voted his choice in local and national elections, and used neither religious nor political affiliation as a litmus for whom he trusted and admired.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Lately, I find myself musing about what my zaide would make of the current elections south of the border. Zaide loved America for the rich and relatively untroubled Jewish life of New York, and also for the opportunities it offered his children – okay, his sons, Zaide was no feminist – where their Jewishness and religious practice would not pose a barrier. There were, of course, still quotas on Jewish admissions to professional schools, and firms that would not hire Jews. But Jews with talent and perseverance could often succeed, and there were even companies where religious observance might be accommodated. Zaide believed that good and trustworthy people could share a neighbourhood, a workplace, a city, a country, and get along.

I imagine he would be as perturbed as I by the way that religion has come front and centre stage in the campaign for the U.S. presidential elections. In the primaries, and now in the two-party heat, candidates and wannabes fall over themselves declaiming their "faith." For example, during one debate, a questioner demanded that each of the Republican candidates declare whether he believed the words of the Bible to be "literally true."

More recently, the very first time the two parties' candidates shared a stage was at evangelical Pastor Rick Warren's California mega-church, Saddleback Church. The candidates outdid one another affirming their faith as Christians. Barak Obama declared, "Jesus Christ died for my sins, and that I am redeemed through Him." John McCain affirmed, "I'm saved and forgiven." And, he noted, "Our faith encompasses not just the United States of America, but the world."

I confess to being more than a tad uncomfortable with this public declamation in the context of presidential elections. I couldn't help but wonder: what if one of the candidates had not been Christian? What if he had been Jewish? Or Buddhist? Or – gasp – an atheist? Why does this deserve centre ring in the political circus?

Certainly, like anyone, a candidate's religious beliefs may inform the values by which he lives and will lead and govern. But in the U.S. political arena, the protestation of "religious values" – pace Joe Lieberman – has always meant Christian values. Ironically, many who talk the talk don't always walk the walk – that is, faith declarations notwithstanding, many play footloose and fancy-free with the Ten Commandments, and sometimes with the Seven Noahide Laws. And many agnostics and atheists are deeply principled.

This focus on religious faith, essentially, on Christianity, means, too, that many ethical issues are framed one-dimensionally, as though there is a religious and a – call it secular, call it heathen, call it godless – viewpoint. This unnecessarily limits the terms of debates on such important issues as organ donation, stem cell research, and end-of-life, where Jews and Christians may parse the ethics differently.

But I'm not opposed to the increased importance of religion in the civic arena simply because my own religion, as a minority, gets short shrift. I object because it removes focus from the real questions: what political policies will the candidate pursue, how will the candidate govern? Or, to put it differently, I'm less interested in a politician's faith professions, and more interested in what he or she has done and will do.

Perhaps this, too, is a Jewish response. In Pirkei Avot, Rabban Shimon ben Gamliel famously stated, Lo hamedrash haikar ela hamaaseh – it is not study but practice, deeds, that matter. I think my zaide, alav hashalom, would agree with my plea to keep religion out of the political arena. Without seeking ideological or religious uniformity, Zaide was respected – and he respected others – for qualities of integrity, honesty and kindness. That would get my vote, too.

The Kirshner File

Israeli Arabs still struggle for equality

As Israel marked its 60th anniversary recently, the Central Bureau of Statistics, a government body, released a report on Israel's current population, disclosing that 1.4 million of its 7.2 million citizens, or 20 percent, are Muslim or Christian Arabs. The data underscored a salient fact: Israeli Arabs – the descendants of Palestinian Arabs who either fled or were expelled from their homes during the 1948 War of Independence – are a sizable minority in the Jewish state. Indeed, in the judgment of some demographers, they will comprise one-third of Israel's overall population within about two generations.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

If this proves true, and if Israel remains a democracy, Israeli Arabs will then be in a position to play a major role in setting Israel's national agenda. Since many of them are generally disaffected and alienated from Israeli society, and consider themselves second-class citizens in terms of acceptance, employment, budgetary allocations, welfare, health and education, the possible ascendancy of Israeli Arabs in the not too distant future will most likely have important ramifications on Israel.

The depth of their discontent is such that the Committee of Arab Mayors in Israel issued a paper last year, titled The Future Vision of the Palestinian Arabs in Israel, accusing Israel of practising discrimination against its non-Jewish citizens in fields ranging from state symbols to core laws. Not satisfied with voicing their deep-seated grievances, the mayors urged Israel to stop defining itself as a Jewish state and start acting like a "consensual democracy for both Arabs and Jews."

Shortly afterward, in the Haifa Declaration, which was published in the daily Ha'aretz, a group of Israeli Arab intellectuals associated with the Higher Arab Monitoring Committee and the Adalah Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel, among other groups, called on Israel to recognize its responsibility for the flight of Palestinian Arabs in 1948 and allow Palestinian refugees to return to Israel. But in their boldest recommendation, they suggested that Israel should be "a democratic state based on equality between the Israeli Jews and the Palestinian Arabs in Israel."

Israel's first Arab cabinet minister, Ghaleb Majadele, a Muslim member of parliament from the Labor party, distanced himself from these documents, saying that Israeli Arabs should work to improve their status through pragmatic political action rather than through ideological programs.

Yet even Majadele, the minister of science, culture and sport, admitted that he, too, feels uncomfortable with Israeli symbols such as the Magen David flag and the Hatikvah anthem.

Another unmistakable sign of their dissatisfaction turns on the attitude of Israeli Arab legislators toward Israel. The majority of Arab MKs, representing such parties as the Arab Movement for Change, the United Arab List and the Israeli Arab Balad party, are at odds with most of their Jewish colleagues on key issues. These MKs, ranging from Ahmed Tibi – the deputy speaker of the Knesset – to Abbas Zakour, strongly believe that Israel should be a secular state, or a "state of its citizens."

Tibi, a physician who was Yasser Arafat's adviser during the failed Camp David summit in July 2000, has charged Israel with discriminating against its Arab citizens and establishing an "apartheid state" in the West Bank.

This past May, three Israeli Arab MKs, including Zakour, caused a stir when they announced that they would boycott a speech to the Knesset by U.S. President George W. Bush, saying they were upset by Washington's support of Israel's "political oppression, occupation and aggressiveness."

Former MK Azmi Bishara

Arab MKs have also raised eyebrows by ignoring a travel ban to enemy states, such as Syria and Lebanon, that are technically at war with Israel.

Several Arab parliamentarians, including Said Nafaa, have justified their unauthorized and illegal trips on the grounds that they are working for family reunification, peace and the easing of tensions between Israel and the Arab world.

This may be true in Nafaa's case, but no such argument can be made on behalf of Azmi Bishara, an Israeli Arab Balad MK who submitted his resignation at the Israeli embassy in Cairo last year after the Shin Bet security service accused him of passing information to Hezbollah during the Second Lebanon War in 2006. Bishara, who has described the accusation as a "fabrication," presently lives in Jordan and fears that he would be arrested should he ever return to Israel.

Bishara, who contested Israel's premiership in the 1999 general election and refers to himself as "a son of Palestine," has been a harsh critic of Israel. He has claimed that Israeli Arabs are "the original owners of this land," branded Israel as a "foreign entity" and likened Israel to the Crusaders.

Not surprisingly, Bishara and Tibi have infuriated some Jewish members of parliament.

Avigdor Lieberman, the ex-minister of strategic affairs and an advocate of "transferring" Israeli Arabs out of Israel, has accused Arab MKs of being fifth columnists and "representatives of terror organizations."

Having demanded that the Higher Arab Monitoring Committee be outlawed, he has argued that it challenges "the Jewish people's right to self-determination."

Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, has expressed indignation as well, having accused Tibi of trying to sabotage a two-state solution to Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

The Jewish MK who has issued the strongest condemnation of their views is Effi Eitam, a former Israeli army general who represents the far-right-wing National Union party in the Knesset.

Reacting to the participation of Arab MKs in a demonstration in which protesters labelled Israel as "a Zionazi state," he warned them that they would be expelled one day from "the national home of the Jewish people."

Eitam's warning should be seen in the context of Israeli public opinion. According to a recent survey, 76 per cent of Israeli Jews agree that the expulsion of Israeli Arabs to a future Palestinian state would serve Israel's interests.

And a report commissioned by the Advocacy Center for Arab Citizens of Israel says that Israeli Jews increasingly support the delegitimization and deportation of Israeli Arabs.

An Arab town in southern Israel [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

The Higher Arab Monitoring Committee concurs with this grim assessment. Its chair, Shuweiki Hatib, has asserted that Israeli Arabs face discrimination on all fronts, particularly in government funding.

On a more historic note, as Arab MK Jamal Zahalka has pointed out, Israeli Arabs are still angered over Israel's expropriation of 80 per cent of their lands since 1948.

Despite their grievances, relatively few Israeli Arabs have been charged with treason or espionage. Each case of Arab disloyalty, though, elicits anger and suspicion in Jewish circles.

Israel's outgoing prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has openly acknowledged that the Israeli Arab community lacks equal rights across the board. "Israel's non-Jewish residents suffer from inequality in various fields," he said last February. "In Israel there is discrimination against the Arab public," he observed two months ago.

Olmert's comments, which cut to the heart of the problems facing Israeli Arabs, are hardly new. In the wake of nation-wide riots in October 2000, during which 13 Israeli Arabs were killed, the government-appointed Orr Commission spoke of an absence of full equality between Israeli Jews and Arabs.

Nevertheless, Israeli Arabs have made considerable progress since the government abolished military rule over their towns and villages in 1966. One example will suffice. Salim Jubran, an Israeli Arab, has sat on the Israeli Supreme Court since 2004. Yet there are still great disparities and a long way to go before Israeli Arabs achieve complete equality.

Architecture reflects congregation's values

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Darchei Noam's new home represents more than an environmentally conscious congregation, said Les Klein, a congregation member and founding principal of Quadrangle Architects Limited, the company that designed the new building.

"I wanted to make sure it was a reflection of the values that drove me to become a member," he said.

Darchei Noam, the only Reconstructionist congregation in Toronto, moved into what used to be the Adath Sholom Synagogue earlier this year. Before purchasing the synagogue, the 34-year-old congregation did not have a permanent home.

The new synagogue, which is environmentally friendly, is equipped with features such as solar panels, solvent-free paints, low-flow toilets, insulated windows, and light sensors to conserve electricity.

Most of the design features in the synagogue represent Darchei Noam's core principles, something that Klein is proud of.

"It allows me to demonstrate that Judaism is a whole way of life, not merely a set of cultures," Klein said.

To Rochelle Monas, co-chair of the synagogue's environmental committee, the building's environmentalism is a key value in itself.

"In terms of Judaism, there's the obligation around bal tashchit, do not waste, and tikkun olam, repairing the world. As a people [we must] take care of the Earth," she said. "It goes back to the Torah. It's there, why would we not [be environmentally friendly] if these are things already in our heritage."

Beyond recycled carpets and solar panels, the outside of the building is covered in Jerusalem stone.

"[We had] the idea of putting Jerusalem stone on the front. It's important to create a visual, to have a clear identity with Israel," Klein said.

In the front hall of the building, the wall is covered in transparent, multi-coloured plaques. They are all more or less the same shape and size, and all hold names of donors.

"One of the key values of the community was that everyone who contributed to the capital campaign be recognized. The donor wall lists all of the donors, there is no differentiation by size or gift," Klein said. "[It shows the value that] every person counts…every Jew is important."

Les Klein, an architect and congregation member, wanted Darchei Noam's new synagogue to reflect its values.
[Rita Poliakov photo]

The decision to build on top of another synagogue is also representative of the congregation.

"We decided not to tear the building down. We felt it was environmentally friendly, also we wanted this reconstruction [to show] the slow evolution of Jewish life," Klein said.

Klein kept the existing synagogue, added handicap-accessible elements and put in an extra floor.

"It's the whole notion of repeating and reinterpreting. The first floor overhung the lower level, which is overhung by the second floor. With everything you do, it's connected," he said, adding that the design goes back to ancient architecture. "A lot of the walls tilt ever so slightly. In the old days, buildings were stronger if you leaned them back."

This historical technique was mixed with a modern location. The synagogue stands on Sheppard Avenue West, an area booming with transportation and construction.

"We're big believers in reinforcing the urban fabric of the city. It's close to the subway line and the bus line. We wanted to reinforce the nature of Sheppard Avenue," Klein said.

Almost, but not quite by accident, the building's skeleton hides the letter Shin.

"The structure of steel is in the shape of Shin, you just don't notice it," Klein said, pointing out the Hebrew letter.

When asked what the new synagogue meant to him, Klein was quick to answer.

"It means that we have a home," he said.

Seniors association celebrates 36th anniversary

By RUTH GOLDSMITH
Special to The CJN

Seniors need to have a collective voice, Michael Scheinert, president and chief executive officer of Circle of Care, said at The 36th anniversary of the Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS).

"There are so many critical issues today, where your disciplined voice must be heard," he told the more than 100 AJS members gathered at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue Aug. 21 to celebrate the occasion.

"Without a collective voice, we cannot possibly influence our governments," Scheinert said. "It is important to remember that you are the owners of our health care and our community care services systems. The politicians are simply the providers. You can have the kind of influence that can ensure health care and community care services that seniors need. Collectively, you can do it!"

Scheinert recalled that 40 years ago, he wrote a proposal for the establishment of AJS.

"It grew from the Permanent Conference on Aging, which was part of the old [United] Jewish Welfare Fund…

"AJS has a long history of achievement, of accomplishment, about which you can all feel proud. After 35 years as president and chief executive officer of the Circle of Care, I can say that I deeply believe in what we are doing."

The organization offers educational and social programs to Jewish seniors, including lectures, health-care seminars, festival celebrations and cultural events.

It also engages in social action to improve the status of all seniors in Ontario.

MPP David Zimmer told the gathering that all his life, he has had an acute awareness of the issues faced by seniors.

"After I was elected in 2003, the first thing we did, with the assistance of the Liberal, Conservative and NDP parties, was to pass a resolution setting aside an annual day in October to recognize Elder Abuse Day," he said.

Morris Jesion, executive director of the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens Organizations, recalled that AJS was one of the founders of OCSCO.

"In 1985, we rented buses to take seniors from Toronto to Ottawa to demonstrate, protest and prevent the Brian Mulroney government from de-indexing old age pensions," he recalled.

Diane Varga, manager of the public education and awareness unit of the Ontario Seniors' Secretariat, pointed out that we now have 1.7 million adults over 65 in Ontario. By 2031, she predicted, that will double to 3.6 seniors.

"The efforts made by the Association of Jewish Seniors engage, challenge and inspire the seniors of tomorrow. Your generation has made it possible for my generation to have the lifestyle we have today," Varga said.

Assault on Jewish visitor raises concerns

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The assault on a Jewish visitor from France that took place in broad daylight on the streets of Ste. Agathe des Monts last month is the latest and most serious incident in what the community's longtime rabbi sees as escalating anti-Semitism in the region.

Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, spiritual leader of the House of Israel Congregation for 23 years, said this summer is the worst he has seen, with a spike in verbal harassment, vandalism and other property crimes directed at visibly observant Jews who summer in this region of the Laurentians.

On Aug. 16, a French vacationer, originally from Montreal, and his three sons, all wearing kippot, were walking to the House of Israel for Shabbat services, Rabbi Carlebach said. They told police they encountered a group of youths who threw pennies at them. The Jewish family objected to the derogatory prank, the exchange became heated, and then one of the teens, who had a ring or other metal object on his finger, struck the eldest of the sons, aged 23, in the face, and ran off.

Carlebach said the young man's face was cut and bleeding, but he did not need to go to hospital.

"What really bothers me is that other people were around and did not come to his aid," Rabbi Carlebach said. The father, he said, asked witnesses to call the police but no one did so.

The Sûreté du Québec said late last week that they were close to making an arrest of a suspect aged 18 to 20, who was among about eight youths involved in the incident.

Rabbi Carlebach thinks the police and municipal officials should recognize that the situation is worsening and try to find a solution. "We can no longer take these as isolated incidents. We feel this is not random; Jews feel they are being targeted."

B'nai Brith Canada denounced the assault as a hate-motivated crime and part of a disturbing increase in anti-Semitism in the Laurentians. Canadian Jewish Congress said the incident "clearly has elements of anti-Semitism," but cautioned against concluding that there is an anti-Jewish campaign in the area or that municipal authorities are losing control of the situation.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, a member of the CJC Quebec region board of directors, said Congress is satisfied that the police are "taking very seriously" this and other incidents in the Ste. Agathe area this season, but does not believe "there is a co-ordinated conspiracy against Jews."

At this point, he said, there is no evidence that a spate of vandalism or break-ins of property owned by Jews were hate-motivated.

Rabbi Poupko said the charge of anti-Semitism is far too serious to be levelled on the basis of a gut feeling, as understandable as Rabbi Carlebach's concerns are.

"The greatest of care must be taken before calling something anti-Semitic," he said.

Rabbi Poupko agrees there are tensions between religious Jews who holiday in the Laurentians and the local population, but does not think the situation is any worse than elsewhere, such as New York's Catskills.

Other incidents cited by Rabbi Carlebach include the spray-painting in July of some 10 cars in the Trout Lake section of Ste. Agathe, where many traditional Orthodox Jews from Montreal have vacation homes. Homes there have also been broken into or damaged, and there has been mischief like garbage cans being turned over.

In early August, a kosher grocery store in Trout Lake, owned by Chassidim, was burgled, but the intention appears to have been to harass rather than to rob, he said. "The freezer doors were open but nothing was taken," said Rabbi Carlebach, whose son works at the store.

Rabbi Poupko said these incidents, while troubling, also should not be labelled as anti-Semitic in the absence of such evidence as hateful graffiti, and he is not prepared to see a pattern yet. "Sometimes vandalism is just vandalism. Because the victim was Jewish does not necessarily mean he was targeted for being Jewish."

Rabbi Carlebach said there has also been an increase in anti-Semitic slurs, mostly from teenagers, and eggs have been thrown at Jews on their way to synagogue.

"I had a nine-year-old going by on a bike say to me, 'Heil Hitler,'" Rabbi Carlebach said. He himself is a Lubavitcher, but the House of Israel is a mainstream Orthodox congregation.

In general, Rabbi Carlebach said the Jewish community has very good relations with other residents and the authorities.

B'nai Brith urged Premier Jean Charest, Ste. Agathe Mayor Laurent Paquette and politicians from the Laurentians to denounce the situation and the police to put adequate resources into investigating what it terms a "rash of hate incidents targeting members of the Jewish community."

This summer's incidents in the Ste. Agathe area are part of a "disturbing trend" of increased anti-Semitism recorded by B'nai Brith in the Laurentians and elsewhere in rural Quebec over the past couple of years, said Allan Adel, national chair of the organization's League for Human Rights.

Because the victims tend to be religious Jews whose identity is visible, Adel thinks it is reasonable to presume these incidents, including the property crimes, are hate-motivated.

Ste. Agathe, about 100 kilometres north of Montreal, is the largest town in the Laurentians with a population of about 10,000.

Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Orthodox Chassidic Organizations, said the Laurentian communities where Chassidim vacation in significant numbers, such as St. Adolphe d'Howard, Préfontaine, Val Morin and Val David have not experienced any upsurge in incidents this season.

"There's always anti-Semitism, but I can't say there's been anything exceptional," he said.

New Israeli humanitarian group launched

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There's a new non-profit humanitarian organization to add to the long list of Israeli groups that work to apply Jewish principles to help those less fortunate both in Israel and in developing countries.

Adam LeAdam, sponsored by the Jewish Agency, is gearing up to launch a community service program aimed at college graduates and young professionals called Leaders for Tikkun Olam based in Israel and India.

Adam LeAdam teamed up with an NGO based in Tel Aviv called African Refugees Development Center (ARDC) to send food and medical equipment to African countries.

"Adam LeAdam tries to apply the principles of Tikkun Olam and general principals of Judaism to the areas of humanitarian relief and assisting others in need," said Ben Brewer, the marketing director of the NGO, adding that it offers aid in the aftermath of natural disasters and works to develop projects to improve education, health and welfare for those living in developing countries.

Brewer, 25, who is an oleh chadash (a new immigrant to Israel) from the United States, has been working with the founders of the organization, Yarden Tenenbaum and Uri Amit, since its inception less than a year ago.

He said that part of Adam LeAdam's mission as a humanitarian organization is to improve Israel's image on the world stage, and to strengthen ties between Diaspora youth and Israelis by including volunteers – 10 from Israel and 15 from the Diaspora – into the program.

There are three main components of the eight-month program. The first is the Israeli experience, during which participants study, train, and volunteer together for four months in Israel. The following three months are spent in India doing humanitarian work for organizations Adam LeAdam has created partnerships with, and the program concludes in Israel where a month is taken to evaluate and assess it.

"Part of the leaders program is to have people be integrated into Israeli society," he said, adding that although the Israelis won't be living with the North American volunteers, every other aspect of the program will be done as a group.

"The Israelis will live wherever they are, but the [North Americans will] participate with them in all the courses and the volunteer work and they get a unique opportunity to meet people their age in Israel."

Brewer said that the volunteers won't be living in a North American bubble.

"We do everything we can to have them integrate as much as one can when they are only in Israel for four months and then back in Israel for a month at the end."

He said that the academic aspect of the program offers the volunteers lectures and courses led by experienced aid workers and academics about the most effective kinds of humanitarian and development programs and how to apply Jewish principles to them.

But the most attractive part of the program, Brewer said, is the three-month stint in India.

"The two founders are in India right now setting up the different connections with different organizations," he said, adding that the participants will apply everything they've learned during the four months in Israel to their work in India.

Brewer said that once the program ends after a month-long wrap-up back in Israel, if the participants want to use the skills they've learned to start a group in their home towns, they will do what they can to assist them.

"We're not making it a requirement for acceptance that you have to go back home and start the greatest community service program, but if that is what people want to do, or something along those lines, we'll help them."

Although the program is sponsored and subsidized by the Jewish Agency and MASA Israel, it still carries a cost to accommodate each volunteer for the eight-month program.

He explained that it costs $13,000 (US) to participate, but there are a number of grants one can apply for to cover much of the cost.

He said for those who are eligible for MASA funding – those who haven't used a MASA scholarship for another program – will automatically be granted $3,000 and based on special financial considerations, an applicant could receive up to $10,000.

Beyond that, Adam LeAdam also has a list of organizations volunteers can contact to apply for grants, and Brewer also encouraged people to contact their local federations about being awarded a grant.

The cost covers accommodation in the Tel Aviv area, meals, transportation, academic studies, volunteer opportunities, social and cultural activities, and medical insurance in Israel, as well as flights, visas, accommodation, meals, transportation, and medical insurance in India.

The Leaders for Tikkun Olam is scheduled to run from Jan 1 until July 31 and applications are being accepted until Oct 15. For more information, visit www.adamleadam.org.

Rabbi issues challenge to clean up shoreline

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On Sunday morning, Sept. 21, Rabbi Schachar Orenstein will don plastic gloves, grab a garbage bag and head down to the riverbank in Lachine and pick up trash.

He's challenging other members of the community to join him in a concrete expression of Jewish concern for the environment. They will be among the tens of thousands of volunteers expected to take part in the 15th annual Great Canadian Shoreline Cleanup sponsored by TD Bank that week.

Orenstein is associate rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, and co-founder and co-president of Teva, the Quebec Jewish Coalition for the Environment, now in formation.

"This appeals to me as a rabbi because it comes a week before Rosh Hashanah and is in keeping with the holidays' theme of coming clean and making a fresh start. Renewal can be at both the inner level and external," he said.

Lachine was chosen in part because it once had a small Jewish community, and was the boyhood home of the late Nobel Prize-winning author Saul Bellow, and its public library was named for him.

Participants will gather at 10 a.m. at the Lachine Visitors Services Centre, 500 Chemin des Iroquois, for a half-hour orientation. They will then comb the scenic shoreline of the St. Lawrence River from 55th east to 6th Avenues until noon. They will be asked to record the type and amounts of debris they find.

People of all ages are invited to join in, including children. Orenstein will bring his daughter Chana, who is almost 4.

This is dirty work and possibly risky if care is not taken, Orenstein said. "But I think it is more dangerous not to do this; think of the kids that may play along these shores and could get hurt by broken glass or other objects. Orenstein, who returned to Montreal last year, was active in the Vancouver Jewish environmental group, Adam va-Adamah (Hebrew for man and earth) and took part in the Shoreline Cleanup of one of that city's beaches two years ago. Chana came along that time, too, and had a great time, he said.

Teva (Hebrew for nature) is the first organization of its kind in Montreal. It has not been officially launched yet, but Orenstein said it is already generating "huge interest."

Montreal is one of the last major Jewish communities in North America without a Jewish environmental group, he said. Toronto alone has several, some along denominational, lines, he noted. "There is a lot going on in Canada, and the United States is miles ahead of us with its innovative programming," said Orenstein, 35, who has personally been involved with Jewish environmental activism for about 10 years.

Part of the reason for the lag in Montreal, he believes, is that younger people tend to lead the way in environmental initiatives, and Montreal is older. "With our demographics, there have been other priorities until now," he said.

That is changing with FEDERATION CJA's launch in 2007 of its go-green initiative, which it hopes will be emulated by all of the community's agencies and institutions. Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region, is partnering with Teva for the shoreline cleanup. It, too, has become environmentally active, working with First Nations and other groups in a project called Communities Uniting for Mother Earth.

Orenstein's fellow rabbis across the denominational spectrum are becoming cognizant of the issue as well, he said, noting that on the agenda of the Montreal Board of Rabbis' next meeting is how synagogues can become more ecologically friendly. The board's president, Rabbi Michael Whitman, is particularly tuned in to the importance of congregations' recycling and reducing their use of natural resources, he said.

The rabbis will be looking at the feasibility of obtaining "green" certification from BOMA, the Building Owners and Managers Association, as the federation has done.

A Jewish presence in Quebec's environmental movement is politically important, too, Orenstein thinks. "The non-Jewish community is looking for a Jewish organization to liaise with on the environment," he said.

Montreal business leaders urged to support arts at Segal Centre

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After paying for its $6-million renovation, Alvin Segal is challenging his fellow business people to now help support the annual cost of running the Segal Centre for Performing Arts at the Saidye.

At the centre's official inauguration last month, Segal, chair of the men's suit manufacturer Peerless Clothing and head of the centre's board, said the facility is for all Montrealers and that he and wife Leanor "can't do it all alone."

The couple, who rescued the former Saidye Bronfman Centre (SBC) from possible closure two years ago, hosted a lavish reception and evening of entertainment to celebrate the completion of the centre's overhaul and the beginning of its new season.

They used the occasion to gently remind those engaged in commerce that they have a responsibility to culture as well. Continued support from the three levels of government is also a must, Segal said.

"A thriving arts and culture milieu are proof that a community is alive and well and looking to the future," he said.

Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay and Quebec culture minister Christine St. Pierre and economic development minister Raymond Bachand were among the speakers at the event.

The co-chairs were Isabelle Hudon, president and CEO of the Montreal Board of Trade, and Simon Brault, president of Culture Montreal and vice-chair of the Canada Council for the Arts. "Whenever I travel in Canada, I always hear about how the business community in Toronto is so ready to support the arts," said Brault.

Hudon urged the guests to take the Segals as an example for cultural philanthropy.

Tremblay said all Montrealers can be proud of the revamped centre, which is creating bridges between communities and promoting an appreciation of the arts, especially among the young. Children exposed to the arts are less likely to drop out of school, get in trouble with law or take drugs, and studies have found they turn out to be more empathetic and civic-minded adults, he added.

He praised the Segals' vision, generosity and inspiration to others.

"Leanor and Alvin Segal are so representative of a community whose contribution has been instrumental in shaping Montreal's identity," he said.

Artistic and executive director Bryna Wasserman said the centre is not only nurturing the next generation of artists, but also the next generation of audiences for the arts.

The renovation ultimately cost double the amount announced in June 2007 and took longer to finish than originally planned.

The centre's lobby was reconfigured and updated and is now a much more inviting area, spacious and soothingly lit with high-tech screens announcing events and a proper reception desk. Other changes were the creation of a second performance space, in addition to the main Leanor and Alvin Segal Theatre, where the art gallery used to be; facilities for the new performing arts academy for children and teens; and the addition of a small screening room and a lounge with a bar on the lower level where the fine arts school was.

All that remains to be done in the public areas is to take delivery of furniture for the lobby and downstairs lounge so users will have a place to sit.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

The real me

By RABBI DAVID ELIGBERG

A favourite Non-Sequitur cartoon of mine depicts a man in a business suit, wearing a party hat, standing at an information booth, saying, "I am searching for the real me."

Like the gentleman at the booth, each of us begins the New Year in search of our real selves.

Who is the real me?

The real me is a believing Jew. Someone who feels a sense of personal connection to the Holy One, who tries to create moments filled with potential for Divine encounter. These opportunities emerge in the frenetic preparations for Shabbat, in the certainty that guests, both human and Divine, are about to arrive. Reciting the brachot that usher in Shabbat connects us to the source of our blessings.

The real me sees generations past, present and future in the dancing flames of the Shabbat candles.

The real me sweats with the effort of putting up our sukkah; picks needles out of his hair from the schach, the branches used to cover the sukkah; shivers in the chill night air while watching the steam rise from a bowl of squash soup; and revels in the sunlight that streams in through the top of the sukkah.

The real me embraces the Torah as its words wrap themselves around me creating joyous moments of celebration, and dancing on Simchat Torah.

The real me is engaged in dialogue across the centuries with Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, Hillel, Rashi, Maimonides and the Ba'al Shem Tov, all of us together unravelling the meaning of the divine word.

The real me feels the connection of family – from those for whom I was named to those who played a special role in my life. The real me feels a debt of gratitude to those who continue to enrich my life with their love and support.

The real me always listens attentively to his wife and answers in words of more than one syllable. The real me also brings home flowers on Erev Shabbat and remembers that it is in the little things that we show our appreciation.

The real me is present for family events, the mundane and the special.

The real me is enthralled by three young children who seem to transform daily with new words, growing abilities and smiles that brighten my day. I wonder how to make the beauty of Judaism apparent to them.

The real me often finds himself fighting against the weight of the ordinary demands of daily life that all of us struggle with. There are moments when the real us, the unique us that God created, seems to be an unattainable goal.

For this reason, we gather on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, surrounded by family, friends and community who see both our real selves and the works in progress. We join together to encourage each other. We want to learn where God's litmus test will place us on the journey to our real selves. We sift through our experiences of the months gone by, searching for those moments when we lived up to the ideal image we have of ourselves, when we translated our values into the realm of human existence.

The High Holidays help us discover who will live to the fullest and become most true to our real selves. The High Holidays challenge me to make the real me show up more often than he does now. The holiness of these days helps us discover that our real self is a reflection of God's hopes and prayers for each of us.

Make each of us be blessed in the coming year to move closer to discovering the real us that the Holy One waits for.

Rabbi David Eligberg is the spiritual leader of Beit Rayim Congregation in Thornhill, Ont.

Prayers answered

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the month of Elul unfolds and we prepare for the arrival of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the shofar calls us to awake and repent, and we search for prayers that will express our innermost thoughts.

The siddur is filled with prayers of thanks and supplication, petition and praise. We use ancient words to convey modern thoughts and challenges, and struggle to balance our routine of prayer with our spontaneous and heartfelt personal prayer. We attend the synagogue and listen to the prayers, sometimes engaging completely, sometimes with wandering minds, and we struggle to return to the prayer content.

Throughout the ages, Jewish sages and scholars have discussed the most appropriate and effective means of expressing ourselves through prayer. Today, we yearn to find what we think might be magical words that will be heard and answered.

As we stand together on Rosh Hashanah, we hope that all we love and hold dear will be inscribed favourably for life and health and success. Where are the words that will accomplish everything that is in our hearts?

If only it were as easy as finding the right words. Many talmudic texts teach us that everything we do to express ourselves is actually a prayer we have composed. Even the clothes we wear are a statement of prayer. One rabbi would wear his finest clothes to express respect for God. Another rabbi would not dress well in order to express his need to God. Yet another rabbi would vary his clothing depending on the state of the world.

Certain other talmudic texts tell us that prayer alone will never be considered in isolation of our actions. People cannot pray for something they themselves are unwilling to give. People cannot ask for forgiveness if they are not willing to forgive others. We cannot pray for compassion if we are unable to extend compassion to the world. We are the image of God and we create the communication based on our actions. If we have chosen to become the image of strictness and unforgiveness, then we will encounter those attributes within God when we pray.

The Talmud comments on the sufferings of Job by framing the events as having begun on Rosh Hashanah. Job is afflicted with personal tragedy, illness and tremendous misfortune. He keeps arguing with his friends that he has done nothing to deserve his suffering and continues to demand that God answer him. At the end of the text, God responds to Job. Yet, God has been silent throughout most of Job's arguments with his friends and his pleading and demanding that God answer. The rabbis state that God answers Job only after Job prays for his friends. Only when he shows compassion toward his friends does God show compassion toward him.

On Rosh Hashanah, we read the Torah portion that tells of Sarah conceiving Isaac. Both Sarah and Abraham are extremely old and have been waiting for this pregnancy and for a child since before they began a journey of covenant. God has been promising them this child for decades. What are the magical words of prayer that unlock this promise and result in the conception of Isaac? According to the rabbis, it is only after Abraham prays for God to heal Avimelech, his friend, that God fulfils the covenantal promise.

Only after we enact deeds of compassion, forgiveness and giving will the words we say in prayer have the power of our intent. When these things go hand in hand, the midrash tells us that Rosh Hashanah has the power of God answering our prayers with the following statement: "My children, I look upon you as if today you have been made for Me anew, as if today I created you, a new being, a new people, a new humanity."

The scrolls get Toronto exhibit

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

It has been almost four years since I embarked on the task of bringing the Dead Sea Scrolls to Toronto. I was upset in 2004 when I found out that Montreal and Ottawa were to get an exhibit of these Jewish documents and Toronto did not. I was determined to do something about it, but it was easier said than done.

Fortunately, I did have 40 years of archeological experience and personal contacts behind me. Furthermore, my position as president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies (CIMS) at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto gave me some credibility. As it turned out we, at CIMS were planning a conference on Cyprus, the Sea Peoples and the eastern Mediterranean, which was held in spring of 2006. The Royal Ontario Museum had expressed an interest in co-sponsoring the conference. (The most famous of these Sea Peoples are Philistines of biblical fame).

Events took a fortuitous turn when I found out that the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA), the guardian of the scrolls in Israel, was to set up a charitable organization in Canada that aimed to acquaint people with Israel's phenomenal archeological legacy. To accomplish this task, the authority wanted to bring a blockbuster exhibit of the scrolls to Canada, especially to the ROM. The authority asked me to help them bring this about.

When I next met with ROM representatives, to discuss the Sea Peoples conference, I asked if they would be interested in hosting a major exhibit of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Indeed, they were interested. Shortly thereafter, I was introduced to the IAA's shaliach, Brig.-Gen. Itzchak Fuchs (retired), or Fuchsi, as he preferred to be called. Fuchsi asked me to help the IAA in getting the scrolls to Toronto.

Within a month, I had Fuchsi in a meeting at the ROM to discuss the possibility of an exhibit of the scrolls. Then things began to get more complicated. Bureaucratic gridlock began to set in. For most of the next year, things got bogged down. Finally, last May, the IAA sent a high-level delegation to meet with ROM representatives.

The museum has now committed to hosting a blockbuster exhibit of the scrolls, after it conducted a feasibility study that showed what I knew to be true all along – that a major exhibit of the Dead Sea Scrolls in Toronto would be phenomenally successful.

Of course, much work remains to be done for such an exhibit. Funds will have to be raised to cover part of the costs. We are also planning to hold a major international conference in conjunction with the exhibit. Two friends and former students of mine, Miguel Singer and Barry Zagdanski, have offered to help raise funds to finance the conference.

Fortunately, I have a wonderful committee made up of three of the top scrolls scholars in the country – professors Sarianna Metso; Hindy Najman, the new director of the Centre for Jewish Studies from U of T; and Eileen Schuller, of McMaster University, who edited one of the original scrolls publications.

Just as exciting for me as a teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for more than 36 years was the fact that a former student, Risa Levitt Kohn, head of Jewish studies at San Diego State University, would be involved in the exhibit. She had been the curator of the immensely successful scrolls exhibit in San Diego, and I recommended to the ROM. She will be the curator of the Toronto exhibit, which is scheduled to open in the early summer of 2009.

For me, this exhibit is yet another rewarding example of how once again the Past moves Forward.

Israel at the Paralympics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

The Beijing Olympics may be history but the Games are about to begin. The Paralympic Games. Four thousand top athletes with disabilities from 145 countries will compete in 20 sports in Beijing from Sept. 6 to 17. Today, a look at Israel's record at the Games, some of its star athletes and the story of the man behind the Paralympics. [tinyurl.com/parawiki]

The idea for creating these Games came from Sir Ludwig Guttmann. Guttmann, a Jew, was a neurosurgeon in Breslau before fleeing to England in 1939. He came up with the idea for the games while working at the National Spinal Injuries Centre at Stoke Mandeville near London, England. "By instilling self-respect, self-discipline, a competitive spirit and comradeship," Guttmann said, "sport develops mental attitudes that are essential for social reintegration." [tinyurl.com/Guttmann]

Guttmann's first games in 1948 were modest by any standards. They took place on hospital grounds and consisted of one sport: archery – eight wheelchair archers from Stoke Mandeville and eight opponents. In 1960, they were renamed the Paralympics, and by the time Tel Aviv played host in 1968, 750 athletes from 29 countries participated in sports including basketball, dart archery, fencing, lawn bowling, snooker, swimming, table tennis and weightlifting. [tinyurl.com/para1968]

Israel team's record is stellar. While it took 52 years of competition for Israel to score its first Olympic gold at Athens in 2004, the country has garnered about 300 medals at the Paralympics. Despite that record, Israel's Olympic committee gets 10 times as much funding as its Paralympics counterpart. As pointed out in the Forward, the committee decided to do something about it. It brought a "complaint about funding before the Supreme Court in May. The judge concluded that the government should boost funding, but said that it was too late to demand a change before the Beijing games." [forward.com/articles/13936]

Going through the website of the Israeli Paralympics Committee is a bittersweet experience. As the site points out, roughly 10 per cent of the country's population – some 650,000 people – suffer from physical disabilities. "These horrifying numbers have always attested to three main factors: wars, road accidents and crippling maladies from birth." At the same time, the team of disabled athletes has "brought a bright ray of hope, both to our beleaguered state and to those among its faithful countrymen who have paid the horrific price." [tinyurl.com/israelpara]

The achievements of these athletes are inspiring. Here's how the Jerusalem Post describes swimmer Itzik Mamistvalov. "Mamistvalov's motion through the water is not so much graceful as it is miraculous. His legs practically paralyzed, his crippled left arm held against his belly, Mamistvalov somehow manages to propel himself through the pool at Beit Halohem in Tel Aviv – with just one good arm, and the heart of a champion." The cerebral palsy that confines him to a wheelchair hasn't stopped him from becoming a world champion in the pool. [tinyurl.com/parapost]

You can get a glimpse of some of these athletes in action. Igor Plotnikov was born with no arms and has also set world swimming records. "Everything depends on the spirit. If you are ready psychologically, then you are able to win. It is possible to cultivate physical abilities. But to cultivate the spirit, I think it is much harder." [tinyurl.com/plotnikov]

For more about these competitors, download the presentation prepared by the Israel Sports Association for the Disabled. It showcases the stars of the Athens games and talks about the preparations as the team heads to Beijing. [tinyurl.com/parapdf]

Eight rowers will represent Israel at the Paralympics. Coach Alexander Skoblo probably understands what make them tick better than anybody else. "It's not connected to the body, it's connected to the mind. For every athlete, it doesn't matter if they are disabled or not. If they have a weak mind, there is nothing to discuss, they can't be athletes." Do his rowers have the right stuff? "I'm excited, but I make sure not to pass that to the athletes. We'll definitely get a medal at the Olympics." [tinyurl. com/paravid]

When the Games begin, you can follow Israel's achievements online and see if his team proves coach Skoblo right. [tinyurl.com/israelrecord]

Scholarship launched to help CA students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In honour of his late grandfather, J. John Shulman, Richard Hoffman has set up a $10,000 scholarship to assist chartered accounting students who have a strong work ethic, high integrity and a need for financial assistance.

The late J. John Shulman

Shulman, who would have celebrated his 100th birthday next July, became a successful chartered accountant despite the hardships that befell his family when he was a child.

"My grandfather was an extremely inspirational individual who did not have an easy beginning to his life. His father was an immigrant who came from Russia, and through his own hard work and brainpower became a successful real estate developer in Aurora, [Ont.]," Hoffman said.

"His father died at a very young age and my great-grandmother, my grandfather's mother, was left destitute with many young children. Here she was, she didn't speak English well, and she had five young kids."

But Hoffman said that his grandfather didn't let that stand in the way of his success.

He sought council on what job he could do and got advice from a man named Jonathan Vise who was Canada's first Jewish chartered accountant to receive the honour of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants' designation of Fellow Chartered Accountant.

"My grandfather decided on pursuing the career of being a chartered accountant and obtained his accountancy degree from Queen's University by correspondence while working full time," Hoffman said.

Shulman soon had his own accountancy firm called J. John Shulman and Company.

"Ultimately, my grandfather became Canada's second Jewish CA to receive the FCA designation."

Shulman, who Hoffman described as bright, funny, inspiring, articulate, loved and the central figure in his extended family, also made a point of giving back to the community.

Shulman was the president of Oakdale Golf and Country Club and the president of Holy Blossom Temple's Brotherhood.

"Mindful of his hard life growing up without a father, my grandfather raised huge sums of money for the benefit of Big Brothers Canada to help other youngsters who grew up without a father," he said, adding that Shulman spearheaded the annual Big Brothers dinner fundraiser that continues 23 years after his death.

Although Shulman was able to overcome his adversities to become a professional, personal and financial success, he was faced with another challenge in his early 60s.

Shulman became legally blind when he developed an inoperable tumour on his optic nerve. He could only see figures.

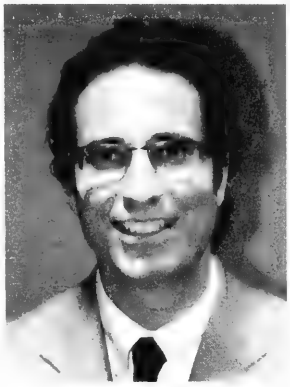
"He went from being a very vital person in his 60s, who looked 10 to 15 years younger than he was, being athletic and running a business and traveling, to being blind. But he carried on. He continued working," Hoffman said.

"He continued to golf even though he was blind. There was a situation where he had a conversation with a certain golf pro who kind of challenged him to a golf match at any time. My grandfather said, 'OK, How's three in the morning?'"

Witnessing the ease at which his grandfather handled obstacles was an inspiration to Hoffman and he wanted to be able to honour him.

"I remember when he died, just before his funeral, I remember thinking I would like to set up a scholarship in his name," he said.

"Having gotten older myself – I'm 48 – and having seen how life can be tricky as I get older, I have more respect for him and in some small way I wanted to [help] someone who might be in a similar situation where life might not give possibility for self-actualizing," he said.



Richard Hoffman

"I would like the scholarship to go to someone who is in chartered accountancy because he was very proud of his profession," he said, adding that it is not exclusive to Jews, but his preference is to keep the scholarship in the Jewish community.

Hoffman said he is looking for a student who embodies the qualities his grandfather had, including a strong work ethic and integrity.

"My grandfather had extremely high integrity. It would be beyond belief that he would ever do something not of a very high integrity. In the business world, there are often many successful people who might be improper or immoral. My grandfather would never do anything like that," he said.

He said the recipient of the scholarship should be someone who needs the help.

"I want to pay it forward to help someone out that would really make a difference to them."

Hoffman is currently accepting applications.

Holiday Food Ideas

Rosh Hashanah is ripe with tradition

As autumn draws closer, our thoughts turn to the High Holidays, which begin with Rosh Hashanah on the first two days of Tishrei – Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 this year – and culminate with Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah three weeks later.

Leading up to the holidays we begin a journey of introspection. We review the choices we've made all year, and we reflect on our relationships, our lifestyles, and our commitment to our family and the community.

As with all Jewish festivals, the High Holidays are ripe with tradition. We pray to God to be inscribed in the Book of Life for the coming year, we throw bread crumbs into a body of water to cast away our sins, and we listen to the shofar's call.

Food plays a large part in these traditions, and just as we wish each other a sweet new year, we serve sweet foods that symbolize our wishes, such as apples dipped in honey, honey cake, and sweet challah with raisins or even coated lightly with candy sprinkles.

Households may stay away from eating anything bitter such as horseradish, for fear of having a bitter year.

Some communities even hold a Rosh Hashanah seder in which they repeat blessings before they partake in symbolic foods.

In addition to the challah, apples and honey, we also eat pomegranates and pray to our ancestors that our nation may multiply like the seeds of that fruit. Some of us serve a fish head to represent the head of the year, and some eat beets so that our enemies will "beat" it.

The holiday meals, usually more elaborate than our typical weekday meals, also incorporate the traditional foods.

To make your menu planning a little easier, we're offering recipes for the novice as well as the experienced cook. We're also including traditional recipes and those that have been tweaked in order to add some "spice" to your meal.

Whether you're planning an elaborate feast or a small family dinner, we wish you, from all of us at The CJN, happy cooking, and most of all, a shanah tovah.

Apple desserts for Rosh Hashanah

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

The bounty of produce that showers Canadians every fall is truly a wonder to behold. From the plentitude of zucchini and string beans that threaten to spill over gardens and grocery stalls to the end run of plums and tomatoes, it can all leave you breathless in appreciation of its largesse and beauty.

The same goes for apples. In the autumn, whether you pick your own or choose to purchase them closer to home, the tantalizing orbs come in so many varieties and flavours that you can choose a different kind almost every day of the week and still have some to choose from. Ida Reds, McIntosh, Red and Golden Delicious, Empire, Cortland, Crispin, Spartan and ye old favourite, Northern Spy, are but a few you will find in markets at this time of year. So celebrate Rosh Hashanah in style this year, with a cornucopia of varieties decorating your table, heralding the sweetness of the New Year. For the apple dessert recipes that follow, use a hardy apple that will hold its shape when baked, such as Golden Delicious or Northern Spy.

SOUR CREAM COFFEE CAKE WITH CINNAMON APPLES

Apple Mixture
3 apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced
3 tbsp. each granulated and light brown sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2/3 cup chopped pecans
Cake
1 1/2 cups light sour cream
1/2 tsp. baking soda
3/4 cup unsalted butter, softened
1 1/4 cups granulated sugar
4 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
2 1/4 cups all purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
pinch salt

Preheat oven to 350. In bowl, gently toss together apple slices, granulated and brown sugars, cinnamon and pecans; set aside.

Stir together sour cream and baking soda.

In stand-up mixer or using hand held mixer, cream butter until fluffy. Gradually beat in sugar, until well blended. One at a time, beat in eggs, beating well after each addition. Beat in vanilla.

In separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder and salt. Using wooden spoon, stir 1/3 of flour mixture into egg mixture. Stir in 1/2 of sour cream mixture. Stir in another 1/3 of flour, then remaining sour cream mixture and then remaining flour mixture.

Spoon 1/3 of batter into lightly greased and floured 10-inch Bundt pan. Top with half of apple mixture. Top with another third of batter, remaining apple mixture and then remaining batter. Smooth top. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 55 to 60 minutes or until top of cake springs back when lightly pressed. Cool in pan on rack.

Unmould onto serving platter and sprinkle top with icing sugar. Makes 12 servings.

INDIVIDUAL APPLE GALETTES WITH ALMOND BUTTERMILK PASTRY

Pastry
2 cups all purpose flour
3/4 cup ground almonds
3 tbsp. granulated sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
3/4 cup cold unsalted butter, cubed
1/2 cup buttermilk
Filling
5 cups sliced, cored, peeled apples (about 4 large)
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tbsp. all purpose flour
Topping
1 egg, beaten lightly
3/4 cup crushed Amaretto cookies, approx.

In bowl or food processor, combine flour, almonds, sugar and salt. Using pastry blender or on/off pulses, cut in butter until mixture resembles coarse meal with a few larger pieces. Drizzle buttermilk over mixture, tossing with fork or using on/off pulses, until mixture just starts to come together. Transfer dough to lightly floured work surface; knead lightly just until dough comes together. Divide dough into 8 equal sized discs. Wrap in plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 1 hour, or until dough is firm. (Dough can be refrigerated for up to 3 days. Bring to room temperature for 10 minutes).

Preheat oven to 400. Gently toss together apples, sugar, cinnamon and flour.

Working with 1 disc at a time, roll each piece to roughly a 7-inch circle. Arrange one-eighth of apple mixture in centre, leaving 1-inch border uncovered. Lift one side of pastry up and over filling and brush fold with beaten egg. Repeat pleating and folding as necessary until a package is formed with an uncovered part in the centre. Brush egg all over surface of pastry. Repeat with remaining dough and filling. Transfer galettes to parchment paper-lined baking sheet. Sprinkle cookie crumbs over exposed apples.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 45 to 50 minutes or until fruit is soft and pastry is golden and crisp. Let cool on rack for 30 minutes. Makes 8 servings.

CRANBERRY APPLE TART IN A WALNUT SHORTBREAD CRUST

Pastry
1 1/2 cups all purpose flour
1/4 cup granulated sugar .
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup cold unsalted butter or hard margarine, cubed
1 egg yolk
1 tsp. vanilla
1/2 cup toasted walnuts, finely chopped
Filling
3 apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced
2 cups fresh or frozen cranberries, coarsely chopped
2/3 cup packed brown sugar
1 tbsp. all purpose flour
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
Streusel
1/3 cup all purpose flour
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
2 tbsp. butter or margarine, melted

Place flour, sugar and salt in work bowl of food processor. Pulse to aerate. Add butter; pulse until mixture resembles coarse meal with butter the size of small peas. Stir together yolk, 1 tbsp. water and vanilla. Pour over flour mixture. Sprinkle in walnuts. Pulse until mixture is evenly moistened but still crumbly.

Working with a handful at a time, bring together dough in palm of your hand. Press into bottom and then up sides of 10-in. French tart tin with removable bottom. Refrigerate for 1 hour or for up to 24 hours.

Preheat oven to 400. Prick bottom of tart shell. Bake in centre of preheated oven for about 15 minutes or until sides start to turn golden and bottom is set. Reduce oven heat to 350.

For streusel: In small bowl, stir together flour and brown sugar. Drizzle butter and vanilla over, stirring until crumbly. Set aside.

Filling: in bowl, toss together apple slices, cranberries, sugar, flour and cinnamon.

Arrange filling in partially baked shell, patting it down slightly to level. Sprinkle streusel over filling.

Bake in centre of 350-degree oven for about 50 minutes or until fruit is tender when pierced with a fork and streusel is golden. Let cool on rack. Serve warm or at room temperature. Serves 8 to 12.

Variations on a traditional favourite — Chicken soup with a difference

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Chicken soup recipes don't have to consist of just chicken, matzah balls, knaidlach, noodles and broth. There are dozens and dozens of variations on the theme – all of them unique and delicious. In fact, the following recipes just might challenge your preconceived notions that bubbie's recipe is the only one you can serve. Bubbie's always tastes the best, but that's only because love is the not so secret ingredient.

MY FRIEND CONNIE'S ASIAN CHICKEN SOUP

From Connie Kadish Evanston, Ill.

Sometimes when I take chicken soup out of the freezer, I want something just a little different, but don't want the added work to create a new soup. This completely changes the soup to Asian very quickly and with no additional cooking.

To your basic chicken soup add the following (suggested quantities are given below):
thinly sliced celery (or you could use some bok choy stalks)
sliced water chestnuts julienned snow peas
shredded carrots
very thinly julienned fresh ginger enoki mushrooms (4 or 5 per bowl, optional)
toasted sesame seed oil, 3-4 drops per bowl

I use about a heaping teaspoon to a tablespoon of each veggie for each bowlful. Add the veggies and oil at serving time. Just make sure the soup is really hot – that way, the veggies, which are very thinly sliced, get hot and yet still stay crunchy.

CHILLED CORN AND CHICKEN SOUP

1 lb. boneless skinless chicken breast
1 1/2 cups chicken broth
1 tbsp. fresh dill sprigs, chopped fine
1 tbsp. finely chopped fresh chives
1/2 lb. boiling potatoes (about 2 medium)
5 cups water
4 cups corn (cut from about 6 large ears), reserving 3 cobs
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. cayenne
1/2 to 3/4 cups ice water for thinning soup

In a deep saucepan, simmer chicken in broth, covered, turning it once, for 10 minutes and remove skillet or pan from heat. Let chicken stand in broth, covered, for 20 minutes, or until just cooked through. Cool uncovered. Chill mixture, covered, at least until cold – about 6 hours or up to 1 day. Drain chicken and shred into a bowl. Add dill, chives and salt and pepper to taste and toss to combine well.

Peel potatoes and cut into 1/2-in. pieces. In a 4-quart saucepan, simmer water, potatoes, corn, reserved cobs and cumin, partially covered, until potatoes are very tender, about 15 minutes; cool. Discard cobs, and in a blender, purée half of the corn mixture in batches until smooth, transferring to a bowl. Stir in remaining corn mixture, cayenne and salt to taste. Chill soup, covered, at least until cold, about 6 hours or up to 1 day. Before serving, thin soup with ice water if desired, and season with salt and pepper if necessary.

Divide soup into 4 bowls and mound chicken in centre. Makes about 9 cups of soup and chicken, serving 4 as a main course. Modifed from www.epicurious.com

CHICKEN NOODLE SOUP WITH SESAME AND GREEN ONIONS

1 lb. skinless boneless chicken breast cut crosswise into thin strips
3 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. rice wine vinegar
2 tbsp. sesame oil
1 tbsp. minced garlic
3 tbsp. tahini (sesame seed paste)*
2 tbsp. minced peeled fresh ginger
1 tbsp. rice wine vinegar
1 tbsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. chili flakes
4 cups chopped Napa cabbage (from 1 head)
6 green onions, thinly sliced
8 cups chicken broth
8 oz. angel hair pasta or soba noodles
1/2 cup chopped fresh cilantro or parsley, optional

In a bowl, combine the chicken, soy sauce, 2 tbsp. rice wine vinegar and 1 tbsp. sesame oil in medium bowl to blend. Let stand 20 minutes or refrigerate up to 2 hours. In another bowl combine the garlic, tahini, ginger, sugar, vinegar and chili flakes and whisk to combine.

Heat remaining 1 tbsp. sesame oil in heavy, large pot over medium-high heat. Add cabbage and green onions and sauté until cabbage is tender, about 5 minutes. Add broth and bring to boil. Add chicken with marinade and tahini-garlic mixture. Reduce heat to low and simmer until chicken is cooked through, about 5 minutes. (Can be made 1 day ahead. Cool slightly; cover and refrigerate. Bring to simmer before continuing.)

Cook noodles in large pot of boiling salted water until tender, about 5 minutes. Drain. Add the noodles to the soup in the pot. Stir in half of cilantro or parsley, if using. Season soup with salt and pepper. Sprinkle with remaining cilantro. Serves 8.

CREAMY CHICKEN WITH WILD RICE SOUP

2 tbsp. margarine or olive oil
1 cup sliced celery
1 cup shredded carrot
1/2 cup chopped onion
1/2 cup chopped green bell pepper
3 tbsp. flour
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1 1/2 cups cooked wild rice
1 cup water
10 1/2-oz. can condensed chicken broth
2 cups diced cooked chicken
1 cup non-dairy creamer or rice milk
1/3 cup slivered almonds
1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley

In a saucepan over medium heat, melt margarine. When melted, add the celery, carrot, onion and bell pepper and cook, stirring occasionally, until tender, about 5 minutes. Add the flour and pepper and stir to coat the vegetables. Add the wild rice, water and broth. Heat to boiling. Reduce heat immediately. Cover and simmer 15 minutes, stirring occasionally. Stir in chicken, non-dairy creamer, almonds and parsley. Heat until just hot, being careful not to boil . Serves 6.

TUSCAN CHICKEN SOUP

Fennel gives this soup a wonderful flavour

1 bulb of fennel, diced small
1/2 cup diced onion,
1/2 cup diced carrot
1/2 cup diced celery
1 tbsp. olive oil
8 oz. skinless, boneless chicken thigh meat, medium diced
1 tsp. fresh rosemary chopped fine
1 14-oz. can diced tomato, low salt if possible
2 cups chicken stock or broth
1 19-oz. can cannellini beans rinsed and drained hot sauce to taste, optional
salt and pepper

Heat the oil in a large pot over a medium heat. Add the fennel, carrot, onion, celery and chicken; stir occasionally for 15 minutes or until the chicken is cooked. Add the tomatoes, broth and beans and simmer for and additional 25 to 35 minutes. Add the hot sauce (if using), salt and pepper to taste. Serves 4. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

Acre – the world's one and only preserved Crusader city

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

ACRE, Israel — Situated on a promontory at the northern end of Haifa Bay, this historic fishing port has the unique distinction of being the world's only fully preserved Crusader city.

Visitors who spend a few hours in Acre's old quarter – which has been designated as a World Heritage Site by the United Nations – can feast their eyes on subterranean Crusader ruins that were uncovered in the 1950s and '60s.

Further excavations in the 1990s brought to light a complex of halls, public toilets and a sewage system, among other facilities. Amazingly enough, many more sites remain to be unexcavated.

The Crusader era is an intriguing one. The Crusaders were European religious zealots who waged a series of wars to wrest Jerusalem and the Holy Land from Muslim rule. The first Crusade lasted from 1095 to 1099 and was followed by eight more Crusades, the last one ending in 1272.

Long before the Crusaders set foot on local soil, the Israelites and the Arabs were ensconced in Acre, which is known as Akko in Hebrew. But once they landed, Acre took its place as a Crusader redoubt from 1104 to 1187. The Crusaders called it Saint-Jean d'Acre.

Recaptured by Salah al Din, or Saladin, Acre was reconquered by the Crusaders in 1191, their forces led by Richard the Lion-Hearted and Philip Augustus, the respective kings of England and France. Acre, the capital of the Crusader kingdom in Palestine, was a vital centre of commerce. In 1291, Acre was captured by the Mamluks, spelling finis to the Crusader presence in the Holy Land.

Conquered by the Ottoman Turks in 1517, Acre gradually fell into decay, and was not revived until the close of the 18th century. Napoleon Bonaparte, commanding an imperial army of 13,000 soldiers, appeared in 1799, only to be repulsed by the Ottomans and Britain.

Under the 1947 UN Palestine partition plan, Acre was assigned to a future Arab state. But shortly after Israel's 1948 Declaration of Independence and the Arab-Israeli war that followed, Acre was seized by Jewish forces.

Although three-quarters of its Arab inhabitants fled, Acre today contains one of the highest proportions of Arabs in an Israeli city. Of 51,000 residents, 28 per cent are Israeli Arabs. At its height as a mercantile centre during the Crusader era, Acre's population was about 40,000.

The vast majority of Acre's Arab citizens live in the old city, a mass of crumbling Ottoman-style buildings set amid a colourful maze of winding cobblestone streets and alleys and open markets redolent of the heady aroma of spices, falafel and urine.

The atmospheric walled old quarter, the focal point of Acre's Crusader past, is administered by the Old Akko Development Company, which carries out excavations, spearheads conservation efforts and conducts tours.

Acre's marina

The tour began at the Citadel, an Ottoman fortification built on the remains of a structure constructed by the Order of the Hospitalers – a Christian monastic organization that tended to pilgrims, the poor and the sick – in 1080. Later, as the Crusaders consolidated their grip on Acre, the order morphed into a political and military organization that defended the Crusader kingdom.

During the British Mandate, the Citadel was used as a prison. The Irgun, a Zionist Revisionist militia, broke into it in the spring of 1947 to free Jewish fighters who were due to be hanged. Leon Uris, the American pulp novelist, incorporated that episode into his best-seller, Exodus. Hollywood film director Otto Preminger also used that jail break scene in Exodus, starring Paul Newman and Eva Marie Saint.

Directly beneath the Citadel is a big vaulted space known as the Knights' Hall. During the Crusader period, European pilgrims slept, ate and stored their supplies here. Eager to eradicate all signs of the Crusader presence, the Mamluks covered the Knights' Hall with sand, thereby inadvertently preserving it for posterity.

Templar tunnel discovered

As I gazed at a fleur de lis – a stylized lily or iris – carved in a corner of the thick sandstone wall, my guide told me that only four per cent of the Knights' Hall has been excavated. Work goes on today as tourists pour through.

The public toilet, with 30 cubicles, is a sight to behold, as is the virtually shuttered Turkish bazaar around the corner. Leaving the bazaar, I was guided to an 18th-century Ottoman bathhouse consisting of hot rooms and a steam room with a marble fountain. In the wake of the Crusader epoch, it functioned as a social centre.

The most impressive building in old Acre, however, is the 18th-century Mosque of Al Jazzar, which stands on the ruins of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, a Crusader church. Regarded as the most beautiful mosque in the Galilee, the green-domed house of prayer is distinguished by a soaring minaret, blue and brown murals and Persian carpets. A lock of hair, supposedly removed from the Prophet Mohammed's head, is stored in a container and displayed once a year when the Ramadan fast ends.

Acre's traditional outdoor Arab market – a jumble of shops and stalls – is close by, as is the tiny Ramhal synagogue. The unpretentious shul was established by a Jewish mystic in the 1700s, when Acre had a modest Jewish community.

The Khan al-Umdan, the centre of Acre's import-export trade during Crusaders times, is but a few steps away. It is visually unappealing, taking the form of a square set off by dilapidated buildings supported by columns plundered from ancient ruins.

The Templar tunnel, a low passageway 350 metres in length, was discovered by chance in 1994 after a local resident complained of foul odours from a blocked sewer. The Templars, a monastic order aligned with the Crusaders, envisaged it as a strategic tunnel to connect the city centre to the harbour.

Acre's port, which boasts of a colorful working marina, looks out at the remnants of Crusader sea walls. Reinforced in the late 17th century, they survived the siege by Napoleon. Arab boys jump off the walls, demanding money from tourists before they plunge headlong into the aquamarine and cobalt waters of the churning Mediterranean Sea.

Obama slams U.S. strategy against terrorism

JTA

DENVER — Barack Obama said Republican "tough talk" was not protecting Israel.

In his speech accepting the Democratic Party's presidential nomination Thursday night, Sen. Obama derided the Bush administration and his Republican rival Sen. John McCain for failing to contain terrorism.

"You don't defeat a terrorist network that operates in 80 countries by occupying Iraq," he said, in a speech to an estimated 75,000 people at Invesco Field in Denver.

Barack Obama

"You don't protect Israel and deter Iran just by talking tough in Washington. You can't truly stand up for Georgia when you've strained our oldest alliances. If John McCain wants to follow George Bush with more tough talk and bad strategy, that is his choice – but it is not the change we need."

Obama has accused Bush and McCain of undermining alliances through unilateralism. He favours intensifying diplomacy as well as sanctions in a bid to keep Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons.

Earlier in the evening, Rabbi David Saperstein, who heads the Reform movement's Washington public policy office, the Religious Action Center, delivered the invocation at the opening of the Thursday session of the convention. Saperstein asked for God's blessing "on all the leaders of our nation," but he singled out by name Sen. Edward Kennedy, who is suffering from terminal brain cancer, as well as Democratic presidential nominee Sen. Barack Obama and his running mate, Sen. Joe Biden.

"May your name be invoked only to inspire and unify our nation, but never to divide it," Saperstein said.

Hamas ups ante in Schalit deal

By BARAK RAVID
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas recently jacked up the number of Palestinian prisoners it wants Israel to release in exchange for kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit, from 1,000 to 1,500, a senior government source said.

At a meeting with senior cabinet ministers last week, both Shin Bet security service chief Yuval Diskin and Ofer Dekel, who was appointed by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to oversee the negotiations, blamed the sudden increase in Hamas' demands on Israel's agreement to a cease-fire with the organization in the Gaza Strip.

Last month's deal with Hezbollah, in which Israel freed terrorist Samir Kuntar and four other Lebanese in exchange for the bodies of two kidnapped soldiers, also hardened Hamas' stance, defence officials said.

The meeting came as the mother of Gilad Schalit said that Israeli politicians were too preoccupied with their own affairs to work for her son's release. Aviva Schalit addressed a rally to mark the kidnapped Israel Defense Forces soldier's third birthday in captivity.

A ministerial committee headed by Vice Premier Haim Ramon was slated to discuss the Schalit deal last Sunday.

Rachel Liel

Director of SHATIL

Meeting Israel's Greatest Internal Challenges

Monday Sept 22
7:30 PM
Darchei Noam Social Hall
864 Sheppard Avenue West

Rachel Liel, Director of the New Israel Fund's capacity building arm, SHATIL has been at the forefront in tackling some of Israel's greatest internal issues.

Israel's young and vibrant democracy, unique in the Middle East, is not without its challenges. Facing widening economic disparities, growing political corruption and despair among its most disadvantaged groups, many Israelis believe that Israel's very existence depends as much on solving these internal challenges as guaranteeing the safety of its citizens from external threats.

For the past 30 years, the New Israel Fund has been unique in empowering citizens to create their own grass-roots organizations dealing with a myriad of issues, from domestic violence to building pluralistic Jewish options, from homelessness and growing poverty to guaranteeing basic civil and human rights. Ha'aretz stated, "There is hardly any significant socially-oriented organization in Israel today that does not owe its existence to the NIF."

SHATIL provides crucial consulting to such groups, builds coalitions among them, and develops young leadership from within communities these groups represent. Rachel Liel, a dynamic speaker and world authority on the development of civil society in emerging democracies, was chosen by The Marker as one of 40 women making the most significant contributions to Israeli society as well as "one of seven Israelis who influence for the greater good." Come meet Rachel Liel, one of Israel's key citizen leaders.

Evading a blockade

Two boats carrying dozens of activists and seven Palestinians broke an Israeli-imposed economic blockade on the Gaza Strip by sailing to Cyprus last week. Israel's navy made no effort to stop the vessels. The two small boats sailed into Gaza five days earlier to protest Israel's year-long blockade, imposed after Hamas gained control of the territory. Since then, Israel has allowed only minimal humanitarian supplies to enter. Few Gazans are permitted to leave due to Israeli and Egyptian travel restrictions. Israel did not interfere with the boats so as "to deny the activists a propaganda victory," said Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Yigal Palmor.

New construction

A report by Peace Now says Jewish West Bank construction has nearly doubled in the last year. The report claims Israel is eliminating the Green Line, the country's pre-1967 border, and continuing to build in isolated settlements. The report was released on the same day U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Israeli and Palestinian peace negotiators. According to aerial photographs and field visits cited in the report, more than 1,000 buildings comprising 2,600 housing units are being constructed in communities beyond the Green Line. Some 55 per cent of the new structures are east of the security barrier.

Caviar exports

Scientists have bred valuable sturgeon fish eggs in Israel for the first time. The sturgeon, which produce the valuable eggs served as caviar, were bred artificially in ponds to mature at a younger age. A company located on Kibbutz Dan in northern Israel, Caviar Galilee, which produced the eggs, expects that exporting the delicacy will yield $7 million (US) annually by 2010. The fertilized sturgeon eggs were brought to Israel from the Caspian Sea eight years ago by Hebrew University scientists. Caviar production in the Caspian is waning because of the effects of over-fishing and pollution. Maimonides, the 12th century scholar and sage, approved a fish called "esturgeon" for kosher consumption, but it is unclear whether esturgeon and sturgeon are actually the same fish.

Peace activist dies

Abie Nathan, whose Voice of Peace pirate radio station broadcast from a ship in the Mediterranean Sea, has died after a lengthy illness at age 81. Nathan was born in Iran and grew up in India. He immigrated to Israel in 1948 during the War for Independence, where he served in Israel's Air Force, building on his experience as a fighter pilot in Britain's Royal Air Force. Nathan tried to accelerate peace between Israel and the Arab world from 1966 on. He went on several hunger strikes in the 1970s to press Israel and the Arab world to make peace. Nathan's Peace Ship, which broadcast pop music and messages of peace, was sunk in 1994 after Israel and the Palestinians signed an interim peace agreement.

Barak in Egypt

Ehud Barak told Hosni Mubarak that Egypt is central to securing the release of Gilad Schalit. The Israeli defence minister and Egyptian president discussed the kidnapped soldier, arms smuggling into Gaza and other issues of regional, diplomatic and security interest during a meeting in Alexandria. He also told Mubarak that Israel appreciates Egyptian efforts to prevent arms smuggling into Gaza and asked that more be done to further reduce the smuggling. Barak also was expected to meet with senior Egyptian defense and intelligence officials.

Police seek missing child's body

By Jonathan Lis
and Igal Hai
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Police believe the grandfather of missing 4-year-old Rose Pizem is concealing the real whereabouts of her body, perhaps for a plea bargain. Ronny Ron is suspected of conspiring with her mother to murder and dispose of the body of the little girl.

On Aug. 26, Ron again re-enacted his story of throwing a suitcase containing the child's body into the Yarkon River.

Police, last week, continued searching for Rose with dogs and volunteers, focusing on Netanya's southern parts and the Yarkon River in Tel Aviv.

Ron was brought to the section of the Yarkon where he had earlier told police he had tossed a suitcase holding the girl's body into the water. Police believe he may not be telling them where he really hid the body.

"It is very possible that he didn't throw the body into the Yarkon," said a police source. He said he did it where a lot of people are around even at night. Yet nobody seems to have witnessed [it.]"

The source added: "The fact that the suitcase hasn't been found up till now makes us think it is very likely not in the river."The police will also expand the search in Netanya.

The Netanya Magistrate's Court last week extended the remand of Ron and Rose's mother, Marie-Charlotte Renault, who is suspected of conspiring with Ron to murder Rose and with helping him to conceal her body.

The police started investigating the case in early August, after receiving a fax message from the Netanya welfare department that Rose had disappeared, commander Yigal Ben Shalom of the Central Unit told reporters.

The city's welfare department had been approached by the National Council for the Child, which had received a letter from Rose's great-grandmother, saying she hadn't seen the child for several months and was worried about her.

"Following the council's approach the Netanya police started looking into the case and visited the family's house several times," Ben Shalom said. "However there was no answer [at the door] and the family was not found. On Aug. 12 police visited the family once more, and Ronny Ron was home, but refused to tell the police where Rose was. His conduct raised suspicions that [he] was trying to hide the child's whereabouts, and "that we might have a criminal act on our hands," said the police source.

The police representative told the court on Aug. 26 that Ron had given the police eight versions of his deeds, including throwing his granddaughter into the Yarkon River, giving her to Bedouins and selling her to Arabs in Na'alin.

Judge Yaron Levy wrote in his ruling that according to the suspect's last version, he had struck the girl in the face while he was driving his car, causing her death inadvertently. After realizing she was dead he put her in a suitcase and threw it into the Yarkon.

"We are doing everything possible to find the body with divers and technological means. If necessary, we'll bring additional equipment," Police Commissioner Dudi Cohen said on Wednesday, after touring the search site along the Yarkon.

Newly emboldened Russia worries Israel

In the telephone conversation last month during which Russian President Dmitry Medvedev invited Olmert to Moscow, the Israeli prime minister bluntly conveyed the extent of Israel's opposition to any such sale to the Syrians.

It would be a pity for Assad to spend billions on arms Israel would be forced to destroy, Olmert reportedly warned Medvedev.

The Russian-Syrian connection goes back to the mid-1950s, when the Soviet Union turned the Arab-Israeli conflict into a proxy war with the U.S.

In those days, the Soviets were perceived as a real threat to Israel's existence and as an obstacle to peace.

Syria became Moscow's chief client state after Egypt expelled the Soviets in 1972 and made peace with Israel in 1979. This changed only in the late 1980s, when Syria no longer could afford to buy conventional weapons from Russia.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, Russia pursued a more evenhanded policy in the Middle East. Although it continued to sell arms to Syria, it developed economic ties with Israel worth more than $2 billion a year – a volume of non-military trade that exceeds that between Russia and the entire Arab world.

Israeli officials do not expect this to change much in the wake of the Georgia campaign.

The key question is what the Russians do in Iran. The record so far is not encouraging.

Russia has done little to help stop the Iranian nuclear weapons drive. On the contrary, Russia has signed lucrative contracts to develop Iranian nuclear plants and oil fields; blocked U.N. Security Council proposals for stricter sanctions; built Iran's Bushehr nuclear reactor; reportedly started supplying Iran with $4 billion worth of air defenses, including S-300 missile systems, to thwart a U.S. or Israeli strike against Iran's nuclear facilities; and reportedly signed contracts worth about $20 billion to build 20 civilian nuclear power stations by 2020.

Israeli officials believe that Russia ultimately does not want to see Iran with a nuclear bomb – that would threaten Russian interests, too. Rather, Israel expects Russia to try to reap as much economic benefit as possible from its Iranian connections while stopping short of allowing Iran to acquire the bomb.

The question going forward will be whether the tension between Moscow and Washington heats up or cools down.

Israeli Defense Minister Ehud Barak is hoping any potential Moscow problem can be defused with incentives from the West. During a visit to Washington in July, Barak proposed that the U.S. give up its planned missile defenses in eastern Europe in return for a clear-cut Russian commitment on Iran.

The Americans, however, were not convinced.

EXTRADITION SOUGHT: The police arrested Itzhak, right, and Meir, left, Abargil, as well as several other men affiliated with the Abargil crime family last week, as part of an ongoing investigation against them by U.S. law enforcement authorities. Itzhak Abargil, believed to be the head of one of Israel's largest crime families, is said to face extradition proceedings, as the American authorities wish to try him for accessory to murder and money laundering. 1948...They Were There

Love and war in Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Daisy and Albert Spiegel came from opposite corners of the world in 1948 to fight in Israel's first war, they couldn't have known that they'd find love, too.

Daisy, who was born in Tripoli and raised in Tunisia, was 19 years old when she first learned about Israel and was taken with the idea of Jews living in a Jewish state. Soon after, she made aliyah and joined the Palmach strike force as a nurse.

Albert, a Canadian who served in the air force during World War II, was 24 when he became a Machalnik (an overseas volunteer) during Israel's War of Independence.

Daisy and Albert came from very different backgrounds – not even able to speak the same language – yet amid the chaos of war, fate brought them together.

Albert Spiegel, standing on the far left of the top row, poses with his unit during Israel's War of Independence.

Albert arrived in Israel before war was declared. He said that he and 26 other Canadian Machals began organizing themselves at the end of 1947.

"It was a hush-hush organization. We organized with Ben Dunkleman," a Canadian Machal who became famous for his leadership of the 7th Brigade.

"In February of '48, I took a train with three guys to New York. In New York, we met up with Haganah representatives, took a boat across on a small Kaiser ship to Le Havre, France, and from there we travelled to Paris and we ended up in a camp near Marseilles," Albert said.

"Most of us on that group were ex-servicemen. We took a refresher course to get in shape in southern France."

He said that from Marseilles, they boarded a boat to Israel, which was filled with young refugees, most of whom were orphans and Holocaust survivors.

"We smuggled into Haifa, and we stayed in Haifa for a day or two and then we went via armoured cars to our designated camp. We joined up with the Givati brigade. There were 27 of us [Canadians]."

He said that after taking part in successful operations on Latrun Road, a strategic hilltop in the Ayalon Valley, the Israeli army decided it wanted to disband the Canadian group.

"They were afraid that if something drastic happened, we would all be wiped out and it would be bad publicity in Canada. They disbanded and everybody went to different units based on their areas of expertise," Albert said.

"I had experience in the Canadian air force as an air traffic controller. So me and another man from England organized the air-traffic control room for the Israeli air force. I was stationed there in a big ex-British air force base near Rehovot."

Daisy, who arrived in June 1948, recalled her journey, after having spent six months at a Hachshara, a training camp, in Marseilles before taking a boat to Israel.

"As soon as we got off the boat, they dressed us up as soldiers at the port in Haifa, and from there, they said we're taking you somewhere. We didn't know where."

But before she was transferred to her army base, she was put up in a hotel in Tel Aviv to get settled.

"They gave us four days off, and in those four days, I met him," Daisy said, referring to her husband of nearly 60 years.

They met at the servicemen station in Tel Aviv on Hayarkon.

"He looked at me and asked me, 'You want to go to the cinema?'"

"I don't remember what I said to her," Albert interjected. "I couldn't speak her language and she couldn't speak mine."

She said she misunderstood his request and thought he was asking if she would go to bed with him.

"I said, 'This stupid guy, asking me to go to bed with him.' The guy came after me, and he said, 'OK, no cinema, we go to eat,'" she said, imitating how her husband motioned with his hand to his mouth so that she would understand.

Daisy Spiegel's Israeli identity card photo

"I pick up my head and I see that the guy was so handsome, and I said to myself, 'Hey, this guy isn't bad.' I thought I was going to die anyway because they were going to take us to the front lines and I thought, 'What the hell,'" she said.

"We went to have falafel, and then he took me to the beach and then there were bombs falling down."

"There was an air raid," Albert said.

"He grabbed me by the hand and took me to a shelter –"

"– an underpass," Albert corrected her.

Daisy said he took her back to her hotel, where she was staying until she was transferred to an army base.

"The next day, he found out where I was going to be stationed and he came to the station. I was going to Saris, a village near the Bab El-wad [a road between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv]. They took me to be a nurse in a hospital in Saris," she said.

"We took all the wounded soldiers, and we looked after them."

She said that she and Albert went their separate ways, until a tragic incident brought them back together.

She said that one night, at the hospital where she worked, there was a raid by the Arabs.

"They came in and killed everybody."

Daisy was spared because she was sleeping in the basement of the hospital, while those on the main floor were murdered.

"I woke up and I said, 'Oh my god, where are all my friends?'"

She said she's unsure how many died and how many survived because she was in a state of shock for which she had to be hospitalized.

"I had a shock and they took me to the hospital in Tel Aviv. "They asked me, 'Do you know anybody?' I didn't have any family, no brother, no sister."

She said the only person she knew was Albert, and the hospital called him.

"He came to the hospital – meanwhile, we didn't even speak. I didn't speak English at all at the time, we didn't speak Hebrew, we didn't share a language."

"But we managed," Albert said.

Daisy said that once she recovered, she continued to work as a nurse, this time in a hospital in Tel Aviv. Albert continue to visit her, and they quickly developed a relationship.

Eight months later, they got married where they met – at the servicemen station on Hayarkon, right on the seashore.

The war was over in March 1949 and a few months later, Albert was discharged.

"I decided that we would try to make a go of it in Israel. I got a job as a carpenter, but it didn't work out. It was pretty difficult, so we decided to come to Canada."

Daisy, who was used to the warm climate of her home country and Israel, had a hard time coping with Canadian winters and always longed to go back to Israel.

"For the last 40 years, we've been going back almost every year – sometimes three times a year – and we always go back to the place where we honeymooned in Netanya," Albert said.

"I love Israel very much," Daisy added. "It is my life. I live for it. I live for my children, grandchildren and husband, but Israel, I love Israel so much. We took it with our hands, such a beautiful country."

Fall Fashion

It is now time to prepare for Fall 2008. Summer holidays are over, and the kids are returning to school. Another season is beginning. Make sure you continue to drink lots of water to hydrate your skin. Herbal tea is also great to drink when the weather begins to get colder. It would be a good idea, too, to use a body scrub and facial exfoliant once a week. Your skin will feel fresh and free from dry cells. And don't forget to moisturize your skin morning and night. Start to bring out your warmer clothing and begin to get ready for the prettiest time of year.

Earthy tones are hot in eye shadows and in clothing. Natural shades of green, brown and grey are what you are about to see. Lips will be lighter and more natural looking, and shades of brown, pink and peach will be worn. Eyeliner will be worn as a fine, very thin line. Do keep in mind that eyeliner is not to be overdone – use shades of brown and grey. The look of tan is now gone and the look of shimmer and glittery makeup will be sought. A natural colour of blush on the cheek will be what you are looking for, because overall, the look for fall will be a natural one.

HAIR: Toronto's Maurice Fiorio tells us that for fall, a shorter, fuller look is in, with soft waves. After the summer, we should aim for deeper colours when we think about colouring our hair. Hair has been stressed and needs to be replenished with pigment to create a healthy, sparkling, luxurious look. Fiorio's philosophy is to aim for a look that is always natural – bouncy hair with a bit of a wave. Having hair loose and messy but tied back and pinned off the face is the look for fall!

Introducing an exciting new lineup from Down Under Natural's – Fruit Kicks Replenishing, with acai berry and blueberry! Packaged in a vibrant blue bottle, the Fruit Kicks Replenishing line is formulated to restore hair with advanced micro-peptide technology while providing a nutrient-rich cleansing experience. Acai berry acts as a natural humectant, moisturizing and hydrating hair and leaving it silky, smooth and shiny. Combined with the known antioxidant benefits of blueberry, Down Under Natural's Fruit Kicks Replenishing line provides natural restorative care for your hair, protecting it from environmental pollutants and prolonging the duration of hair colour while maintaining the hair's ideal moisture balance and adding body and shine.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA AND SKIN CARE: Wrinkles are not attractive, regardless of where they appear on the face. Above all, those vertical lines that form around the upper lip are unappealing. At last, NeoStrata launches a lip enhancer that has visible pucker power – New Anti-Wrinkle Lip Enhancer! This plumping and anti-wrinkle complex is not only a quick fix, but also more importantly, it's an anti-wrinkle concoction that restores a youthful fullness to lips.

Dermaglow Nuvectin has introduced a new anti-aging serum to its line called Retinol – PX. This serum is unique in that it combines encapsulated pure retinol complex and peptides, creating a powerful anti-aging blend of antioxidants to transform skin for a more youthful appearance. The results are a visible reduction in wrinkles and a smoothing effect, a significant reduction in hyper pigmentation and age spots, and improved firmness of the skin.

Share the secret of great skin with your best friend! – Dermaglow's theme for the month of September. Dermaglow understands the importance of a great skin-care regime. For the first time ever, it is giving its number 1 wrinkle cream away for free. With every purchase of Dermaglow Nuvectin Advanced Wrinkle Therapy 50mL, customers get one complimentary product to share with their best friend. Advanced Wrinkle Therapy is a progressive wrinkle fighting treatment that is clinically proven to reduce the appearance of fine lines and wrinkles by up to 50 per cent. It works by combining peptides and antioxidants to give your skin a youthful texture and appearance. Nuvectin Advanced Wrinkle Therapy is proven to increase collagen production, and relax facial muscles and even skin tone.

Annabelle's new oil-free Eye Makeup Remover Cloths are pre-moistened to gently remove eye makeup while leaving the delicate skin around the eye area soft and clean without dryness or irritation. The resealable package ensures freshness with each use and is practical for today's woman on the go.

Elizabeth Arden introduces new Ceramide Gold Ultra Lift and Strengthening Eye Capsules. These pure, potent, single-dose capsules fortify skin in the eye area to help fight fine lines and crow's feet and give eyes a lifted, smoother, brighter look. They visibly lift and contour the look of sagging skin in the eye area and supports natural collagen levels to give skin a firmer, less lined appearance.

Rethink your brows, and support breast cancer research at the same time with Tweezerman's Pink Ribbon Slant Tweezers. Whatever the style, well-groomed eyebrows are like the cherry on top. To help you look great and support a great cause, Tweezerman is proud to announce the continuation of its Rethink sponsorship. Pink Ribbon Tweezers are made of stainless steel with a baked-on enamel finish featuring the signature breast cancer pink ribbon. The perfectly aligned hand-filed tips ensure you can grab hair easily every time.

Clarins introduces Extra-Firming Lip and Contour Gentle Exfoliator, an exfoliating lip care that is specially formulated for the fragile area of the lips and lip contour, combining an effective and delicious sensation; and Extra-Firming Lip and Contour Balm to restore the youthful beauty of the lips and lip contour.

Clarins Men introduces After Shave Energizer that tones and intensely refreshes the skin, while also purifying and is especially adapted for oily skin. Also, don't miss After Shave Soother. The alcohol-free texture leaves a non-oily, anti-dehydrating veil on the skin's surface, and nourishes and restores weakened skin's suppleness and softness.

Take time to rest, relax and revive with the new Wellbeing range from The Body Shop. This natural regime nourishes the mind, body and soul to help eliminate stress and anxiety in our busy, everyday lives. Each of the four ranges is based on traditional herbal remedies to address modern lifestyle concerns. Choose from Total Energy, designed to energize and refresh; Divine Calm, to help wind down and de-stress; Deep Sleep, to promote tranquil rest; and Gently Purify, to aid the body's natural purification.

Ombra introduces Ombra Rose and Green Tea, Aromatic Foambath and Body Wash. Ombra has developed a wide selection of eight aromatic bath and body washes that have a positive effect on one's mood and general well-being. They are highly recommended for invigoration, stimulation of the senses, relaxation and stress relief. Light up your wardrobe with Secret's New Revolutionary Tights! Tights might be your favourite legwear accessory, but until recently, they were stocked in your sock drawer waiting for the cold, chilly days of winter. Now, thanks to Secret's revolutionary new Light Tight, you can create a sleek, modern look all year round. Light Tight is also available in a control top version that gives the body a figure-flattering, long smooth line. Whether it's the first days of spring, a cool August evening or a fresh fall afternoon, Light Tights are the light-as-air accessory that will keep you in step with style.

FRANCINE'S TIPS:

CONCEALER AND FOUNDATION: Revlon introduces a new collection of makeup – Revlon Beyond Natural. One compact contains two pans of makeup – a concealer and a highlighter to both cover imperfections and spotlight your best features. The concealer covers imperfections, under-eye dark circles and blemishes, while the highlighter creates radiance so that you can accentuate cheekbones, inner corners of eyes, and brows.

Marcelle introduces the new Concealer Palette, which allows you to personalize the concealing process by choosing the best shades for your skin colour to achieve the desired coverage.

Are you looking for a foundation that is as natural looking as your skin? Well don't look any further, as Clarins will introduce in October Instant Smooth Foundation, the effect of this foundation is magic and rejuvenating.

BLUSH: If you want a look that says tender and sweet or intense and chic, Estée Lauder has a solution for you. Introducing Signature Blush – the newest addition to the Estée Lauder Signature colour franchise. New Signature Silky Powder Blush is lightweight in feel and creates a true blushing effect, while New Signature Satin Cream Blush is a dewy, luscious formula that melts onto your skin for a warm, beautiful hint of colour.

EYESHADOW, EYELINER, MASCARA: The Body Shop Autumn Trend 2008 collection unveils its dynamic duo of eye shadows infused with extract of the exquisite night blooming cactus. Each palette is embellished with a unique design of a flower in full bloom.

Elizabeth Arden puts eyes in the spotlight with a collection of new shades to shape and shadow, line and define for endless effects. It all begins with new Color Intrigue Eyeshadow Duos, a collection of perfectly paired eye colours in seven sophisticated and mistake proof combinations.

An important staple for every woman's makeup case is Cargo Essential Palettes, shadows that are debossed with application guidelines – outer corner, crease, lid and browbone – to ensure a perfect application.

Now, to intensify that beautiful eye, Revlon introduces Line Fantasy Cream Eyeliner for a limited time only. This eyeliner provides rich colour and precise application for beautifully defined eyes from subtle to dramatic. The creamy texture wears all day and won't smudge or smear. The ultra-fine brush provides each application with a precise line.

Annabelle's New Volumelash.com Mascara is the first mascara in the cosmetics mass market with a hybrid brush: an innovative brush-comb combination that gives instant volume and lash definition – lashes are five times more voluminous!

LIPS: Are you looking for a lipstick that won't feather or bleed? Well, don't look any further. Elizabeth Arden Color Intrigue Effects Lipstick delivers lustrous colour, lasting shine and intriguing effects. This new formula with innovative, wearable shades glides on smoothly to provide full coverage, and instantly moisturizes and helps maintain moisture balance on the lips.

For all ladies who are just not comfortable wearing lipstick, there is something for you. Cargo's High Intensity Gloss combines the shine and hydration of a lip-gloss, yet has the colour intensity of a lipstick. The non-sticky formula delivers gorgeous colour and wet-look shine with a delicious milk chocolate scent.

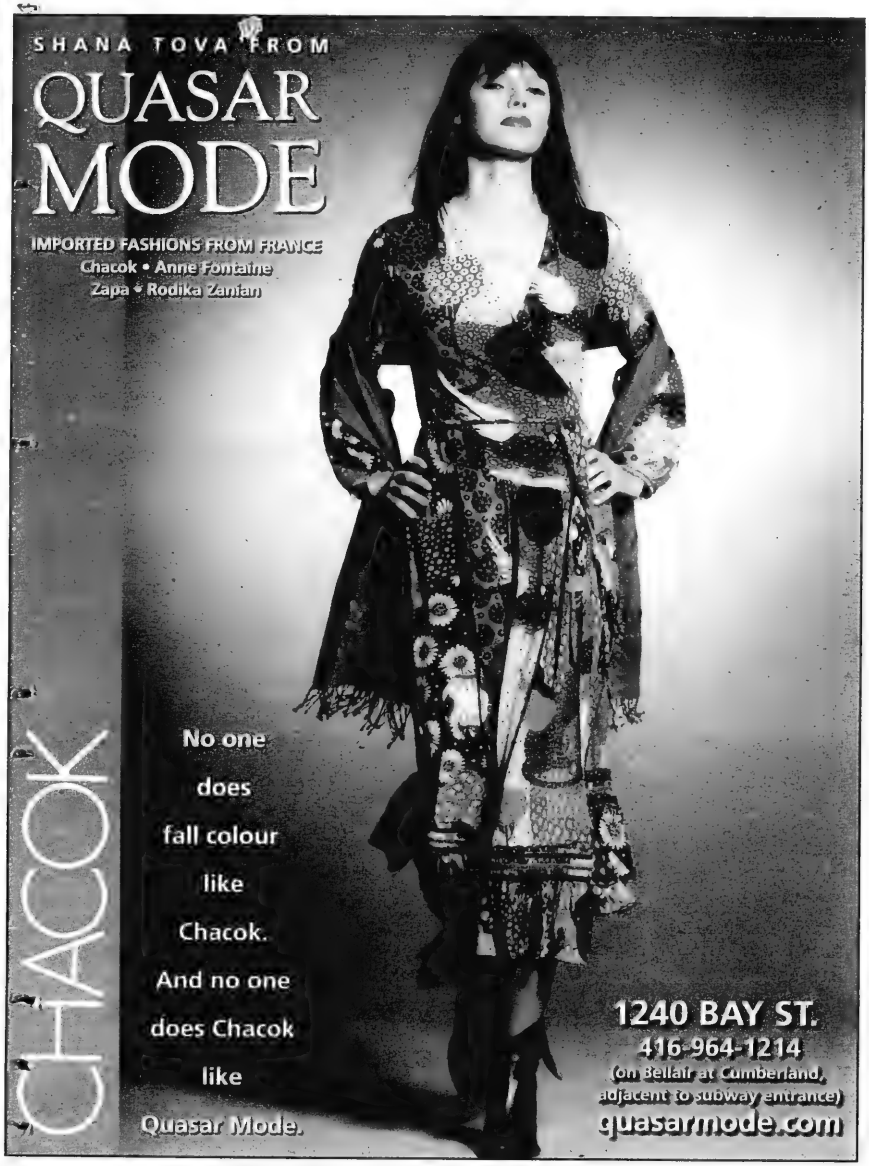
No5 Paris Chanel Eau Premiere

FRAGRANCES: This season, fragrances are warm, sexy and sophisticated. Chanel is pleased to introduce N5 Eau Premiere. What makes this perfume so special is that it still maintains the wonderful qualities of No5 since it uses the same ingredients, but it ends with a fresher, softer scent as if it were an Eau de Toilette.

For the women who want to remain stylish even during their toughest workout, Adidas has designed a new range of female fragrances. Emotions in Motion is made up of four fragrances, and four moods, all captured in four brightly coloured, slender bottles. Each fragrance is specifically created to suit your personal style and with lasting power to keep up with you all the way.

Mariah Carey introduces a new fragrance, Luscious Pink. The fragrance is beautiful, and the bottle captures a rainbow of iridescent colour and is a glowing sphere of beauty.

Please remember that October is Breast Cancer Awareness Month, and all these wonderful cosmetic companies are supporting this important cause with amazing promotions. Make sure not to miss them!



The Village Spa at Sam Jakes Inn

The Village Spa at Sam Jakes Inn in historic Merrickville, Ont., has an array of holistic, esthetic, advanced esthetic and medical esthetic services more often seen at larger facilities in major city centres than at a quaint country inn.

Spa Life
By Kathryn Kates

"Our mission statement is to create an escape for body, mind and soul, whether it be for 30 minutes or eight hours of relaxation and getting yourself together," says owner Linda Pophal, who opened the spa on the banks of the Rideau Canal, in July 2002.

Pophal, a clinical esthetician trained in medical esthetics including services such as microdermabrasion and non-surgical facelifts, works alongside two estheticians, a reiki/reflexologist and an orthotherapist.

An orthotherapist uses massage, stretching, joint mobilization and posture assessment to ease muscular pain, stiff joints, organ or systemic problems, and is covered by many medical insurance plans.

"Our treatments are very diverse," says Pophal. "Our holistics include reflexology, reiki, Thai massage, ear candling, hot stone massage and orthotherapy massage. We offer esthetics like manicures, pedicures, waxing, facials and bridal makeup, and we bring in an outside hairdresser when needed.

"Advance esthetics include body wraps and lymphatic drainage, while the medical esthetics include microdermabrasion, non-surgical facelift, intense pulsed light therapy (aka laser), and photo rejuvenation."

According to Pophal, the most popular services are massages, pedicures and facials. A service gaining popularity is the two-hour reflexology pedicure, which combines holistics and esthetics in one treatment. Reflexology promotes relaxation, releases endorphins and reduces pain soreness in the feet.

"We are an Aveda spa," she says referring to the environmentally friendly beauty products. "For the medical esthetics, I use Swiss Med products from Switzerland. We use OPI for nails and Gehwol for pedicures. We are also introducing what we call the 100 Mile Spa Diet, where we sell local products like soaps, scrubs from Kikko Soapworks and an Ostrich oil and cream from a local farm," she says.

The Village Spa's client ratio is 60 per cent women and 40 per cent men. Over the years, Pophal has seen an increase in couples enjoying the spa services together. She says she does cater to locals, but mainly to guests of Sam Jakes Inn.

Spa services can be packaged and customized to suit each client's needs. Sam Jakes Inn offers a number of packages including the Mid-Week Retreat(ment). The one-night package includes overnight accommodation, a country breakfast, a sweet treat and a $60 spa voucher per person.

The Village Spa boasts four treatment rooms, a wet sauna, change rooms, a lounge and a library shared with the hotel and often used for groups to hang out in at wedding parties, reunions and girlfriends' weekends.

According to Pophal, Sam Jakes is a very English country inn, and the décor in the spa follows suit. The walls are painted in warm colours of yellow and barnboard red.

Local artists' work is displayed and for sale throughout the spa.

Sam Jakes Inn is a UNESCO heritage site

The inn is named after the original owner who moved here in 1861. Sam Jakes, an Irish immigrant, was a highly successful merchant who owned a department store in town.

By 1988, the building had become derelict and was purchased by innkeeper Gary Clarke, who the same year was named Canada's Tourism Man of the Year for his work in heritage and environmental areas. Through his efforts, the building was designated a UNESCO World Heritage site. Extensive restoration followed.

The three-storey structure has 30 rooms, a lobby, a restaurant and lounges. In the fall of 2000, the adjacent granary, circa 1860, was restored, adding three luxury suites, a large high-tech conference room and a reception centre. The rooms are all decorated differently with some antiques, but many of the furnishings are handcrafted replicas of pieces used in Lanark County during the 1860s.

Merrickville, "The Jewel of the Rideau," is rich in artisans. You can spend hours walking the streets checking out stores filled with beautiful pottery, glass blowing, stained glass and much more. Boat trips along the picturesque canal are offered in the warmer months from 11a.m. on.

Actor Louis Gossett Jr. gives Shabbat sermon

By AARON LEIBEL
Washington Jewish Week

When this reporter spelled his last name for Louis Gossett Jr.'s publicist last week, she began laughing. "Leibele is his Yiddish name," she said.

Lou Gossett Jr. has a Yiddish name?

It's true, confirmed the African American actor, who couldn't recall the origins of his nickname.

"Maybe it's because I used to take off Jewish holidays" from school, quipped Gossett, who delivered the Shabbat morning sermon in late August at Ohev Sholom – The National Synagogue in Washington, D.C., discussing his connection to Jews and Judaism and his nonprofit, The Eracism Foundation (www.eracismfoundation.org).

Gossett, 72, grew up in the Coney Island area of Brooklyn, N.Y., where many of his neighbours were Jews.

His warm relations with them and the sense of community they shared were "a beautiful thing," he said in a phone interview from Kenya, where he was slated to go on Safari the following day. (He began the interview by saying, "Boker tov," Hebrew for good morning, and ended it with "Erev tov," good evening.)

"If my parents were late, I had the choice of [eating] gefilte fish or sauerbraten" at a neighbour's house, he said.

Gossett said his experiences as a youngster in Brooklyn provided the "nurturing" that helped him succeed. And with his foundation, which he began in 2006 to fight racism through education, programs that foster cultural diversity and anti-violence initiatives, he hopes to initiate programs for kids that will re-create the values he learned.

He wants to help young people in the most distressed areas combat racism, sexism and violence. "I want to protect them against the evil of the streets," he said.

He wants them to learn "self-respect, so they know where they come from and what is expected of them, respect for the opposite sex, respect for their elders."

Louis Gossett Jr.

Gossett was enthusiastic about his appearance at Ohev Sholom and about the shul's spiritual leader. "Rabbi Shmuel [Herzfeld] has adopted me," he said. "I love him."

Rabbi Herzfeld shares those warm feelings. He heard Gossett speak at the Conference on Race and Reconciliation at the National Press Club in Washington in July.

"I was very impressed by how he spoke and how his relationship with Jews has inspired him to want to make a difference in the lives of inner city youth," Rabbi Herzfeld said.

After hosting the award-winning actor for Shabbat, the rabbi invited him to speak. Gossett is not the first African American to speak at the synagogue, but may be the first to deliver the Saturday morning sermon.

"It's a wonderful opportunity to see a person who was given a gift to be a good actor, but is utilizing his gift to better the world," Rabbi Herzfeld said.

President of his senior class at Abraham Lincoln High School, Gossett got his start in acting when a Jewish English teacher, Gustave Blum, who had been a Broadway director, encouraged him to try out for the Broadway production of Take a Giant Step. He got the part at age 17.

Gossett's acting career has included dozens of roles in movies, TV and onstage, most notable of which were his Emmy-winning portrayal of Fiddler in the TV series Roots; the sergeant in An Officer and a Gentleman, for which he received an Academy Award; and his Golden Globe-winning work in the TV film, The Josephine Baker Story.

Currently, he is starring in Stargate SG-1, a series on the Sci-Fi cable channel. At the end of August, he also appeared in the HBO documentary The Black List, which will present portraits of 20 influential African Americans.

The actor's Jewish links extend into adulthood. He became interested in the role that black American soldiers had played in freeing Jews from concentration camps during the Holocaust, hosting reunions between survivors and rescuers in New York City in the 1990s. He also narrated, with Denzel Washington, The Liberators, a documentary on the subject.

CJN Profile

Novelist creates a fit and fearless Jewish detective

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Benny Cooperman, move over. There's a new Jewish detective in town, and he's not quite the laid-back sort of sleuth we're generally used to in crime fiction featuring Jewish characters.

Howard Shrier's debut novel, Buffalo Jump (Vintage Canada), is the well-written, smart, keenly observed, often funny and utterly suspenseful tale of Toronto investigator Jonah Geller and what happens when hit man Dante Ryan comes to him for help in getting out of a job because one of the intended victims is a five-year-old boy who reminds Dante of his own son.

Howard Shrier

Jonah, who's still recovering from a gunshot wound sustained in an undercover operation gone wrong, and hurting from subsequently being dumped by his girlfriend, is suspicious at first but gradually becomes drawn into aiding – and befriending – Ryan, especially when it turns out the hit is tied to an investigation Jonah's firm is conducting, one that eventually comes to revolve around large-scale smuggling of Canadian pharmaceuticals into the United States.

From the time the 51-year-old Shrier first conceived of the novel, five years ago – "[I was] up at a cottage, ran out of books, had nothing to read, so I started scribbling some notes..." – he was determined that Jonah's character would be a departure from the best-known intellectual Jewish shamuses, notably Howard Engel's small-town Ontario sleuth Benny Cooperman and Harry Kemelman's Rabbi David Small.

"I wanted somebody who had both sides to him," says Shrier, over coffee in Toronto's Annex neighbourhood, "[somebody] who's smart, who's clever, but who is fit [and] somewhat fearless, although he voices his fears. He's capable of stepping up.

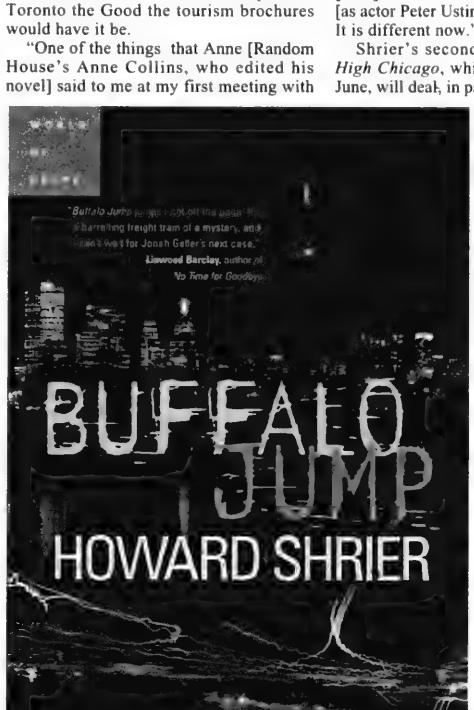
"It's not a character that's common in Jewish literature – essentially they're not physical specimens, they're not fighters, and I wanted Jonah to be [one] and that was one of the hardest parts of writing the book, finding the character, a Jewish character who had some of my sensibility but who also had training in martial arts, had been in the Israeli army, had experiences that had made him tougher."

Readers of Buffalo Jump will become aware of that early on in the novel when Jonah forcefully deals with an anti-Semite who's grabbed a streetcar seat that he intended to go to a frail old woman. "I've had a few people call me or e-mail and say, 'Oh man, that was satisfying, I've always wanted to be able to stand up when someone's behaving that way and say shut up' and Jonah does."

Shrier also emphasizes Jonah's belief in the classic Judaic concept of tikkun olam, "repairing the world," with Jonah memorably adding, "one asshole at a time." Says Shrier, "I think Jonah is looking for a little bit of a progressive Jewish vision in his life, the idea of tikkun olam, because he feels that he's made some mistakes in his past, especially during his time in the army, and he has things to make up for."

Buffalo Jump is a Toronto-centric novel, but one set in a Toronto that's not quite the Toronto the Good the tourism brochures would have it be.

"One of the things that Anne [Random House's Anne Collins, who edited his novel] said to me at my first meeting with her [was] 'this is a Toronto that we don't see in books, a Toronto that has panhandlers, garbage, graffiti, more dangerous areas, guns, guns that are sometimes blazing on Yonge Street.'



"This is a bit of a different Toronto, and I think part of it is that the city has changed. I moved here [from Montreal] 25 years ago. You didn't see a piece of litter and you didn't see graffiti, and the TTC ran [well]. It was New York run by the Swiss [as actor Peter Ustinov famously declared]. It is different now."

Shrier's second Jonah Geller novel, High Chicago, which will come out next June, will deal, in part, with the city's envy of other metropolises, like Chicago, whose magnificent pristine waterfront puts its own to shame.

The success of Buffalo Jump – its reviews have been almost unanimously laudatory – vindicates Shrier's decision to leave a good job at the LCBO, after 11 years as a senior communications consultant there.

"I wrote the annual report speeches, a lot of stuff [like that], millions of words. [But] it was becoming the same old, same old."

After discussing his options with his wife, Harriet Wichin, the manager of cultural arts at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (the couple has two children), Shrier left his job in October 2005. "I finished the book in March of 2006 so I just needed the final push, and then it went out in March and then at the end of May I had my first lunch with Random House [whose Vintage Canada imprint put out the book as part of its World of Crime series], he said.

"I wanted to get a book deal by my 50th birthday and my agent [Helen Heller] walked into my party the night I turned 50 with my contract from Random House. That was the best 50th birthday present anyone got me."

A primer and a polemic about Syria

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

To Barry Rubin, an Israeli scholar who specializes in Middle East affairs, Syria is something of a basket case, a country that, in his corrosive words, is "ideologically bankrupt, economically backward, geographically circumscribed and militarily feeble."

Barry Rubin

But why should we lose sleep over a blinkered, underdeveloped Third World nation like Syria?

Because Syria, Israel's antagonistic neighbour to the north, has played what he describes in The Truth About Syria (St. Martin's Press) as "a powerful and negative role in shaping the modern Middle East."

Let us count the ways.

Syria has inflamed the Arab-Israeli conflict by having hosted Palestinian radical organizations at war with Israel.

Syria has supported Hezbollah, which touched off a 34-day war with Israel in the summer of 2006.

And, of course, Syria has meddled in Lebanon's internal affairs, which has a direct bearing on Israel.

And yet, as Rubin adds in this primer and polemic, Syria is weak, lacking Egypt's power and Saudi Arabia's financial clout. In addition, due to its diverse population, Syria lacks internal coherence.

In Rubin's view, Syria has squandered what seemed like a bright future. Syria has ample natural resources, fertile land and an entrepreneurial middle class. Yet a politicized officer class, driven by militant ideas borrowed from Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, pushed Syria down the path of totalitarianism rather than democracy.

As a result, from 1949 onward, Syria was extremely unstable, falling prey to a succession of coups.

Hafez Assad, a general who seized power in 1970 and ruled until his death in 2000, ended that era of instability by exercising ruthless repression.

In 1982, for example, he crushed an Islamic revolt in Hama, levelling whole neighbourhoods and killing about 10,000 civilians.

Assad's son, Bashar, has perpetuating the family dynasty through a carrot-and-stick strategy.

Syrians who do not question the legitimacy of his Baathist regime – which is philosophically grounded in fascism and communism – have access to good jobs and careers.

Dissenters, however, are scorned and punished. This tactic, Rubin observes, keeps the small opposition isolated and intimidated.

Striking some balance in his narrative, he acknowledges that the Syrian government was never as draconian as the Baathist regime in Iraq in its treatment of its citizens.

The Syrians knew that a gentler but still firm approach would be advantageous in terms of stifling dissent and minimizing damage to Syria's international image, the fallout of the Maher Arar case notwithstanding. (Arar, who holds dual Syrian and Canadian citizenship, was deported to Syria by the United States and tortured.)

For a while after his ascendancy, following his father's sudden death, Bashar Assad encouraged reform, but this period was a short-lived one, like a mirage in the desert.

"From the regime's standpoint, the reform movement was not a group of people trying to make Syria better, stronger and more prosperous, but a malignancy that threatened national survival," he writes in a typically tough passage.

At best, he notes, Assad wanted only to tinker with the system, seeking "technocratic improvements" that would usher in economic benefits without real political or social change.

Rubin believes that three factors have kept the creaking Syrian economy afloat: revenues from declining oil production; remittances from about one million Syrian workers in Lebanon; and Arab foreign aid, which peaked in 1990 when, in exchange for its participation in the first Gulf War, Syria received between $4 and $5 billion from Saudi Arabia and other Arab states.

Apart from stability, he credits Baathists such as the Assads with bringing land reform and a measure of social mobility to Syria.

But on balance, the Baathists brought more harm than good, "smothering a vibrant society under a gray authoritarianism," Rubin writes in one of his harshest indictments.

In a reference to two of the least desirable legacies of the Baathists – who govern on the basis of iron-clad control and incessant indoctrination – Rubin cites rampant corruption and a total absence of freedom of the press.

At the very least, Syrian businessmen can prosper only if they toe the Baathist party line. As for the media, most journalists are employees of the ministry of information, which speaks volumes.

Rubin also takes Syria to task for promoting anti-Semitism through the media and television shows and for harbouring the Nazi war criminal Alois Brunner, who was Adolf Eichmann's assistant.

On another front, Rubin condemns Syria for its support of terrorism. Syria's sponsorship of extreme Palestinian factions, ranging from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine to Hamas, goes back more than four decades. To avoid incurring Israel's wrath, he notes, Syria routed attacks on Israel through Jordan and Lebanon in the 1960s and '70s.

As well, he is critical of Syria's role in Lebanon, a nation whose sovereignty Damascus did not officially recognize through formal diplomatic relations and the establishment of an embassy in Beirut. Last month, though, Syria announced a readiness to recognize Lebanon under certain conditions.

Since Rubin's working assumption is that Syria's objective is Israel's destruction, he argues that Syria would be better off not signing a peace treaty with Israel.

Claiming that the Syrians have more to lose than to gain in peace, Rubin says that a full-blown agreement with Israel would increase regional stability, raise the profile of the United States in the area and enhance Israel's position in the Arab world.

These are outcomes presently opposed by Syria, suggests Rubin, whose book was published before the Syrians and the Israelis launched their latest round of peace talks in Turkey several months ago.

Although Israel and Syria have conducted preliminary and indirect talks so far, the Syrians have expressed an interest in elevating them to the level of direct negotiations once the Bush administration leaves the stage and Israel formally agrees to withdraw to the pre-1967 border.

If the Syrians are indeed sincere, Rubin's grand theory about their lack of ardour in genuine peace would fall by the wayside.

Film festival movies take on war in Lebanon and terrorism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 4-13 this year, plans to uncork two films on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The first, Ari Folman's Waltz with Bashir, deals with the problem explicitly, while the second, Atom Egoyan's Adoration, uses it as a platform for examining related and unrelated problems.

Folman's animated documentary focuses on Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon. Atom Egoyan's Adoration, a full-length feature, revolves around a 1986 terrorist plot that might have downed an El Al airliner, killed its 400 passengers and probably sparked a war in the Middle East.

Waltz with Bashir, with a running time of 87 minutes, is sober and powerful, a meditation on a massive military operation that turned sour. The film is both a commentary on the ground war and Israel's role in the shameful Sabra and Shatila massacre.

As seen primarily from a foot soldier's vantage point, the war is brutal and ugly. Folman spares us nothing, mainly filtering his memories through the eyes of a 20-year-old grunt just trying to survive in a bloody landscape. The massacre, which was carried out by the Phalange, a Lebanese Christian militia aligned with Israel, sets the tone of Folman's gripping film.

Rachel Blanchard and Noam Jenkins in Adoration

One hundred minutes in length, Adoration, the winner of the Jury Prize at the Cannes Film Festival, represents Egoyan's first foray into the thickets of Israel's struggle with the Palestinians. It stars Rachel Blanchard, Noam Jenkins and Devon Bostick, among others.

Best known for such art films as Exotica, The Sweet Hereafter and Where the Truth Lies, Egoyan's latest confection is based on a real incident in which a pregnant Irish woman was cynically used by her Palestinian boyfriend as a pawn in a deadly game that could have had terrible repercussions.

Dark and brooding and complex as only an Egoyan film can be, Adoration touches on tangled personal relationships and modern technology, as well as the nature of terrorism and martyrdom.

Egoyan does not take sides, remaining cool and neutral as he confronts these issues.

The first public screening of Waltz with Bashir takes place on Thursday, Sept. 4 at 9 p.m. at the Ryerson. The second screening is on Sept. 7 at 3 p.m. at the AMC3.

Adoration will first be screened on Monday, Sept. 8 in the early evening at the Elgin. An exact time has yet to be determined. The second public screening is scheduled for Wednesday, Sept. 10 at noon at the Scotiabank theatre.

Gitai shifts from the Mideast to the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Until now, Israeli filmmaker Amos Gitai has hewed rigorously to Middle Eastern topics, but in Plus Tard, Tu Comprendras, he ventures boldly into new territory.

Starring Jeanne Moreau, Gitai's feature film burrows deeply into a still sensitive topic, the Holocaust in France.

Scheduled to be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Thursday, Sept. 4 at 6 p.m. at the Ryerson and again on Friday, Sept. 5 at 4:30 p.m. at the Varsity, it is based on Jerome Clement's autobiography.

Clement's mother, a Jew, married a Catholic just before the outbreak of World War II and was thus spared the fate of about 76,000 Jews in France who were deported to death camps in Poland.

Plus Tard, Tu Comprendras, a Franco-German co-production, is dedicated to her, and like many films about the Holocaust, it explores two interlocking themes, remembrance and identity.

The chief protagonist, Victor Bastien (Hippolyte Girardot), is the 40-year-old son of Rivka Gornick Bastien (Moreau), who is modelled after Clement's mother. As the film opens, he wanders through a Holocaust memorial in Paris, glancing pensively at slabs into which are carved the names of thousands of French Holocaust victims. His face is a mask of sorrow and puzzlement.

It is May 1987 and the war crimes trial of Nazi war criminal Klaus Barbie has just begun. This sombre scene sets the tone of this quiet, reflective film.

In a nearby neighbourhood, Rivka is watching Barbie's trial on television, fixated on a survivor's testimony recalling the deportations that condemned Jews in France. Judging by Rivka's expression, the trial is having a tangible effect on her. Strangely enough, though, Rivka is impassive when Victor visits her on the eighth day of the proceedings.

Although he considers himself a Catholic, Victor is keenly interested in his family's Jewish dimension. Rivka's Russian Jewish parents, the Gornicks, fled to a village after France was conquered by Germany in 1940. Subsequently denounced, the couple was deported to Auschwitz, from which they never returned.

Having investigated this era, Victor discovers a letter that his father wrote to the Vichy authorities in which he made a point of declaring his Christian ancestry and his daughter's baptism.

Talking to Rivka, Victor wonders whether his father should have written this letter. "He could have acted differently," he says, leaving the impression that his father behaved cowardly. Victor's sister has no such qualms. In her opinion, the letter saved lives, hers and her mother's.

Victor's show of anguish has no immediate impact on Rivka, who prefers to discuss a forthcoming antique sale and a lamb dish she has cooked for lunch.

Plus Tard, Tu Comprendras unfolds quietly in these emotionally charged scenes, but in a disturbing flashback replete with shouting, pushing and shooting, French police are seen rounding u Jews.

Hippolyte Giradot plays Victor Bastien in Plus Tard, Tu Com prendras playing at the Toronto International Film Festival.

Having immersed himself in the past, Victo visits the village where the Gornicks were be trayed. Concerned about his state of mind, Victor' wife asks him to step back a bit.

When she asks Rivka whether the Gornick spoke Yiddish, she changes the subject to gree tea. Once again, Rivka engages in repression. Bu in an abrupt role reversal, Rivka opens up, takin her two grandchildren – Victor's son and daught – to a synagogue on Yom Kippur. "I was born Jew," she says, telling them about the Gornick and showing them the yellow star that Jews wer forced to wear during the Nazi occupation.

Rivka's sudden loquaciousness, we learn, rooted in her desire to salvage something positiv from the Holocaust. Resist intolerance and fig against discrimination, she asserts, in what is t film's implicit mantra.

In this quietly absorbing film, Gitai's messag strikes a universal chord.

MIRVISH ACQUIRES CANON & PANASONIC THEATRES AFTER LEGAL SKIRMISH WITH DANCAP

Theatre impresario David Mirvish of Mirvish Productions successfully brushed aside a legal challenge from theatrical rival Aubrey Dan of Dancap Productions last week and completed the purchase of two major theatres. He acquired the 2,300-seat Canon Theatre and the 700-seat Panasonic Theatre, both located on Yonge Street in downtown Toronto.

Justice Geoffrey Morawetz of the Ontario Superior Court refused to grant Dancap an injunction preventing the sale of the properties, which were sold to Mirvish by Key Brand Entertainment.

Dancap had acquired a 12.5 per cent share in Key Brand last January, but with it came "no competing ownership rights of the theatres," Morawetz said, adding that Dancap had no legal basis to stop the sale of the theatres to his main competitor.

Reportedly, Dancap agreed to pay Key Brand $5 million and post a letter of credit for another $7.5 million for the right to manage the theatres and to schedule shows there. However, Mirvish had a lease to the theatres and retained first right to purchase them in the event of a sale, Morawetz found.

In a statement, Dan said he "remains confident that it has a strong position on the merits of its legal claims" and would be reviewing its legal options.

Jersey Boys, Dancap's latest show, opened last week at the Toronto Centre for the Arts in North York, and runs until Oct. 5. The musical, based on the story of the music group Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons, opened on Broadway in 2005 and remains among the top five grossing shows in New York.

Despite the show's success, Dancap has been seeking access to quality downtown venues and a more direct connection to the tap of tourist dollars, since many tourists are reluctant to venture out of the downtown core.

The acquisition of the Canon and Panasonic solidifies Mirvish Productions' hold on some of Toronto's key theatrical assets as well as its rank as the city's foremost theatrical producer, a position it has maintained since the demise of Garth Drabinsky's Livent Inc., a decade ago.

Mirvish also owns and operates the 1,500-seat Royal Alexandra Theatre and the 2,000-seat Princess of Wales Theatre, both on King Street West.

New Play from Poch-Goldin: The 4th Line Theatre in Millbrook, Ont., presented a reading last weekend from The Right Road to Pontypool, a new play by Alex Poch-Goldin. Set in the midst of a quiet Ontario farming community, the play is based on the Toronto Jewish community's summer resort experience in the first half of the 20th century. For decades, Pontypool's pond and fresh country air made it a favourite holiday destination for thousands of Jewish immigrants from Toronto.

Poch-Goldin is a playwright in residence at 4th Line Theatre and his previous play, Yahrzeit, won a Toronto Jewish Playwriting Award. The Right Road to Pontypool is slated for production in 4th Line's 2009 theatrical season.

Names in the News: Sir Paul McCartney is scheduled to play a concert in Tel Aviv next month, 43 years after his former band, the Beatles, was banned from playing there out of concern it would corrupt young fans.

"We can't wait to get out there and rock," McCartney said of the Sept. 25 concert date. "I've heard so many great things about Tel Aviv and Israel, but hearing is one thing and experiencing it for yourself is another."

While in Liverpool this year, Israeli ambassador Ron Prosor apologized to the band for the "misunderstanding" that prevented them from performing in Israel in 1965.

Arts in Brief

• Moments in Time, a new collection of solo dances, opens choreographer Maxine Heppner's 2008-09 season. A transplanted Montrealer, Heppner has been creating dances here and internationally since the 1970s.

Moments in Time is performed by Japanese dance artist Takako Segawa at Pia Bouman Studio Theatre, 6 Noble St. (Queen & Dufferin), Sept. 12 to 14. 416-531-8557.

• The David Buchbinder Ensemble performs at the Rex Hotel, 194 Queen St. W., every Sunday in September at 7 p.m.

At the Galleries: Overlap, a joint exhibition by Toronto artists Rochelle Rubinstein and Lanny Shereck, is on view at Loop Gallery, 1174 Queen St. W., until Sept. 21. An artists' reception takes place on Sunday Sept. 7, 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.

Israeli cartoonist wins comic book award

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Rutu Modan never thought she could make a career out of drawing comic strips. Turns out she was wrong.

The Israeli comic book author and artist proved this year that she could, in fact, do just that. She won the Will Eisner Comic Industry Award for best graphic novel-new for her first graphic novel, Exit Wounds. She received the award at this year's Comic-Con in San Diego on July 25.

Rutu Modan addresses the crowd at Comic-Con last month.

Speaking to The CJN from Sheffield, England – where she's currently living with her husband and children – Modan, a native of Tel Aviv, admitted she was caught off guard by her win.

"I was completely surprised. I was sure I wasn't going to get it," she said. "It was unbelievable. There's [usually] no glamour in the world for comics artists… so I was in shock. I managed to say something on stage, but afterward, I started shaking."

At its heart, Exit Wounds is a mystery: its central character searches for an estranged father who may or may not be a victim of a terrorist attack in Israel. But it's also a story of love, family and the strange decisions people make in the heat of the moment.

Drawn in a deceptively simple yet expressive style, the book is based on an Israeli documentary film by David Ofek called No. 17, which recounted a terrorist attack on a bus in Israel, Modan said.

In the film, "nobody came to claim one of the bodies. The director was trying to find who the body was. This message was very strong for me. How it could be that somebody could disappear without anyone claiming them? I hope, if it were me, someone would claim me," Modan said.

Published in 2007 by Montreal independent press house Drawn and Quarterly, Exit Wounds was also nominated for a Quill award last year.

Modan said it took two years to write and draw the graphic novel, a departure from her usual short story offerings, and called the experience "difficult and painful."

"I initially told [Drawn and Quarterly publisher Chris] Oliveiros that I couldn't do it," she said. "I was afraid he wanted the Israeli version of Persepolis, but I told him it wouldn't be… and I had to tell my own story."

Not comfortable proselytizing, she didn't want the book to focus on Israeli politics, so she decided instead to focus on the human element that all readers could understand.

"I put things in there that happened to me. Pieces of life… my relationship with my father," she said. "I used to think I had to write more shocking [themes] to make stories extreme. But I found out that reality is extreme enough."

The first page of Rutu Modan's Exit Wounds

Modan, 42, has had an illustrious 20-year career as an artist in Israel, winning four Best Illustrated Children's Book Awards from the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, and she was named 1997's Young Artist of the Year by the Israel Ministry of Culture, among other accolades.

While flattered by the laurels, Modan insists she's just following her destiny.

"I was drawing before I could speak, and inventing stories before I could write," she said. "I can't think about myself without [thinking about] drawing. It's part of my identity, like being Jewish. But I never thought about it professionally. All my family are doctors, lawyers, accountants.

"My father used to say, 'What a waste. You could be such a great plastic surgeon with your hands.' But I hate blood," she said with a laugh.

Modan entered art school after her military service and graduated cum laude from Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Art and Design.

In the mid-1990s, she and fellow Bezalel graduate Yirmi Pinkus decided to found Actus Tragicus, an Israeli comic book collective of five writers and artists that enabled its members "to reach an audience outside of Israel by publishing a book each year, free of any cultural limitations or economic hindrances," its website says.

Modan said she founded Actus Tragicus "because there are no comic publishers in Israel."

Encouraged by her Eisner Award win, Modan said she'll be working on a second graphic novel in the new year.

"I learned that I really want to do graphic novels. For 20 years, I wanted to do this… but now I feel more confident working for a publisher. It was a dream come true. Though it was difficult, I was happy doing it every minute."

Modan is currently working on a 17-chapter comic strip for the New York Times.

Museum tells story of Jews of Barbados

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

The Jewish community of Barbados celebrated a joyous milestone in February 2008 with the opening of the Nidhe Israel Museum, which overlooks the Jewish cemetery and historic Nidhe Israel Synagogue in Bridgetown.

The museum's exhibits document the contribution made by Jews to the island, one that had profound effects throughout the 17th and 18th centuries.

Barbados is home to the oldest synagogue in the Americas, built in 1654 by Sephardi Jews who were fleeing the Portuguese Inquisition in what was then Dutch-administered Recife (the Netherlands controlled almost half of Brazil, with their capital in Recife).

When the Jews arrived on the island, they brought with them invaluable experience from 25 years working on Brazilian sugar plantations. With the contribution of the Jews, Barbados' production technologies exceeded those of any other sugar-producing island, enriching Barbados considerably.

Nidhe Israel Museum, which in Hebrew means literally "the scattered of Israel," tells the story of the Jews of Barbados and connects the past with the present.

Founded by the Montreal-based Groupe DES, the interactive museum was built inside what was once the Jewish schoolhouse. It overlooks the cemetery, which has graves dating back to 1658 and contains the tombstones of the community's founders. The museum uses some of the tombstones as a motif inside, on its floor. This creates a visual connection between those buried outside and their stories, which are told in the museum.

Walk deeper inside the museum and you'll find yourself standing on glass cases containing artifacts that belonged to Barbados' Jews.

"When the cemetery was restored a few years ago, the community found it to be the repository of bits and pieces of daily life in Bridgetown," says Paul Altman, the driving force behind the construction of the museum and one of its major benefactors. Those artifacts include pipes, perfume bottles and fragments of dishes.

It was important to Altman that the Holocaust be impressed on the minds of those who walked through the museum. He created an arch over the entrance that says "Yizkor," and the theme of remembrance is mentioned repeatedly in wall panels.

A far cry from the dusty, glass-encased museums of the recent past, where nothing can be touched, at Nidhe Israel Museum interactivity is key. Since Jews were involved in the spice industry, one wall panel invites visitors to inhale the aroma of various spices and guess which ones they are smelling. A film about Barbados' history and the Jews' involvement in local industry can be viewed, and the literature and pictures on the wall panels are informative and compelling.

The museum was under construction for two years at a cost of $1.5 million, two-thirds of it donated by the Monaco-based Tabor family. It's a new chapter in the island's Jewish history.

There are only 16 Jewish families remaining in Barbados, but, says Altman, Friday night services are usually augmented by Jews visiting from the world over. Many have expressed interest in holding their Jewish celebrations at the historic synagogue, and Altman is already making plans to acquire land alongside the cemetery to build a reception facility.

For now, though, his attention is diverted by excavations going on in front of the synagogue's doors. In March 2008, the original rabbi's house was unearthed by a team of archeologists from the University of the West Indies. Alongside it, they discovered what just might be the oldest mikvah in the Americas

CD based on the stories of Genesis

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — New to Israel's Bookstore in Toronto and elsewhere is a recently released CD, Mostly Genesis with a Little Exodus, by Winnipeg's Michael Eskin.

Eskin is a man of many parts. A well-known food scientist, he is also a well-known chazzan. Mostly Genesis With a Little Exodus, his first CD, is a compilation of stories taken from the Torah and put to music for children and families.

Eskin did his voice training in his native Birmingham, England. His father was a chazzan and a shoichet. The younger Eskin trained at the Birmingham School of Music and studied cantorial voice in Birmingham and London. He was a soloist in Birmingham's Zimriyah Society and sang in the Zimriyah (festival of choirs) in Israel.

Eskin came to Winnipeg in 1968 to teach at the University of Manitoba, where he is now a full professor and acting head of the Department of Human Nutritional Sciences as well as associate dean of the Faculty of Human Ecology.

The CD was seven years in the making. "I had done some satirical writing and some work for Sesame Street," he says. "Friends and relatives suggested that I do something with a biblical theme.

"This CD covers some of the wondrous stories found in Genesis. In preparing the verses, I have tried to be as true to the text as possible, while still making them interesting and fun to sing."

Mostly Genesis With a Little Exodus starts with the biblical story of the Creation and ends with with Joseph and Pharaoh's dreams. The final track is a "Pesach rap," based on the struggle between Moses and Pharaoh. The CD brings these stories to life with lyrics that are original, and there is a blend of different musical styles, including folk, reggae, klezmer, country and rap.

Eskin notes that the musical arrangements were done by his son, Josh, a local musician, who also plays the accompaniment on the CD.

Mostly Genesis With a Little Exodus is not only enjoyable but is also textually accurate, notes Jason Marantz, a former Winnipegger who is currently headmaster of Wolfson Hillel Primary School in Southgate, London, England.

"As a learning resource, Michael's CD is quite unique," Marantz says. "The engaging melodies and insightful yet entertaining lyrics make the Torah stories featured both accessible and inviting."

Marantz was so impressed with the CD that he is creating a teacher's guide with Eskin to go along with it, supported by a grant from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. The foundation also awarded Eskin a grant to help with the production of the CD, and a copy of the CD was recently sent to and acknowledged by Rabbi Jonathan Sachs, England's chief rabbi.

When the University of Manitoba's public relations department heard the CD, they were so enamoured with it, particularly the Passover rap, that they made a video of it and put it on YouTube. To see it, go to www.youtube.com and type in Eskin's name. Eskin's website describing the CD in more detail is www.eskinmusic.ca

Standup tickles comedian's funnybone

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Michael Gelbart is a standup star.

Often, the comedian performs an hour of material at a comedy club without a prepared script, effortlessly captivating his audience with witty jokes and personal anecdotes.

For many, this would be an impossible feat.

For Gelbart, this is his passion.

"Standup is my favourite way to get immediate feedback from the audience," he says. "It's weird that I do it because I choked at my bar mitzvah."

Gelbart has done it all in the world of show business – he's starred in two of his own comedy specials, on CBC and CTV, spent three years writing for the Gemini Awards and has contributed to a variety of TV shows and movies in Canada and the United States, as a writer and actor.

And he's only 35.

But regardless of all the areas of comedy he's dabbled in, nothing tickles his funny bone as ferociously as standup comedy.

"Whenever I'm performing on TV there's no ad libbing. The producers want to know everything you'll be saying in the exact five minutes you're doing it, and you have to stick to that because there's no room for spontaneity on TV," he says. "That's why I like the live experience and performing live the most."

Gelbart was born in Montreal and moved to Toronto in the late 1980s with his parents. At 17, he had his first performance at a comedy club to an audience of more than 40 people, consisting mostly of family and friends, and his set was received with much enthusiasm and support.

"I killed it that night and everyone got a huge laugh. I thought I was the king, and the entire week after my performance I walked around school with my head held high and thought I was going to be huge," he says.

"The next week I went back and only four or five people came and it was mostly an audience of complete strangers, and I brought the girl I liked from school. When I went on stage, I was super confident and did the same material as the previous week, but the minute I got on stage I got booed. I couldn't handle it, so I got off the stage after three minutes – I was so embarrassed and I still had to drive home with the girl! One minute, you're the coolest guy and the next, you're a loser."

In the beginning of his standup career, Gelbart avoided using personal material because it made him feel vulnerable. He figured if the audience didn't like his jokes, they didn't like him, and he focused his comedic talents on movies, actors and television shows, keeping himself at a safe distance from the audience.

Now, after years of performing, Gelbart's material centres on his perception of everyday situations, because he says it keeps things current rather than outdating his humour with movies that age over time.

"The best standups care deeply about making it look like they don't care, and if the audience sees that you're comfortable, they go with it. They'll accept that you're funny without even hearing you. You have to be relaxed, and they have to trust you know what you're doing," he says.

"Sometimes I look at an audience and acknowledge things in the crowd, like the guy on a first date, or whatever strikes me as happening in the room. I like to acknowledging rather than going onstage with a prepared act to recite."

Based in Los Angeles for more than five years, Gelbart works for the Disney Channel and Nickelodeon as a script writer for tween audiences. He considers himself a writer and a comedian more than an actor, and most of his acting is attributed to casting himself into his script in minor supporting roles.

Michael Gelbart, a comedian, writer, producer and actor, says he loves going back to his standup roots because it's "the most pure expression."

"My writing career has supported my ability to not rely on standup for income. I do it more for the love of doing it," he says.

"Anytime I get to do standup on TV is my favourite experience because you kind of direct your standup – you write it, produce it and you're responsible for all of it. When I work on a movie or TV, it's very collaborative and I enjoy that, but the only pure thing that I have is my standup. There are a lot of people who have input in a larger project, but the most pure expression I have is during my standup."

Gelbart's most recent project is Shark City, which co-stars actor Cory Haim. It's a film about two best friends living in New York City and looking for love in all the wrong places. One friend finds his dream girl, who happens to be the daughter of the biggest mobster in town, and the other friend swindles the mobster out of a million bucks.

"Working with Cory was surreal because I've seen so much of him on TV in whatever way he's being depicted – real or not– and to be next to him, watching it unfold, was surreal," Gelbart says.

"It was a lot of fun to make this movie, and I ended up laughing every day."

Up next for Gelbart is completing his first book, which he hopes to finish by September, as well as writing and starring in a new movie for the producers of Shark City, and developing TV projects with various networks in Canada and the United States.

In the meantime, Gelbart will no doubt continue to hone his standup skills.

"They say if you're good at standup, you can be good at anything, because standup is the hardest," he says.

"You choose whatever direction it goes in, and that goes with anything in life. It's about trusting yourself, believing in what you're doing and that everything will turn out all right."

Trillium Foundation grant boosts BBYO

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Kelly Indarjit, BBYO regional president of B'nai B'rith Girls (BBG), and Josh Harendorf, regional president of the boys' wing of BBYO, Aleph Zadik Aleph (AZA), are thrilled that BBYO recently received a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation.

The $73,500 grant, which will be dispensed over two years, will be used to hire more staff, seek out alumni, advertise, and generally boost the organization's programming.

Mark Harendorf, Josh's father and chair of BBYO board for Lake Ontario region, began working with the organization when his son got involved with it.

He said that BBYO needs more members – it currently has about 250 – and needs more money. "Youth programming has been declining in general because kids these days are pulled in many different directions.

"We want to help kids grow up and give back to their community and expand programs, which are all youth-led."

He said up until now the organization has been completely self-funded. "We're on our own, and we want to reach out to alumni who may get involved and give donations. The grant will allow us to develop a data base."

BBYO is planning an alumni kickoff event and a massive mailing, he said. "We haven't had any manpower to do this. The grant will allow us to take staff to do media relations and alumni affairs."

Until now, he said, BBYO's big fundraiser has been the annual golf tournament, but that only covers one-quarter of the budget.

Josh, 16, who spent the summer on various BBYO leadership programs, said that once young people join BBYO, they realize how important they are to the community. "They really grow up."

Kevin Goodman, BBYO regional program director, said the grant will allow the organization to reach more teens through fun and effective programming. "We empower teens to be leaders through social action, Judaic studies and social programming.

"It will also allow us to reach out to the more than 20,000 alumni, who can rekindle their passion for BBYO."

Red Sox all-star key to team's playoff hopes

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Kevin Youkilis doesn't see himself as an American League MVP candidate and isn't paying too much attention to the chatter that has recently started to throw his name into the mix.

The Boston Red Sox cleanup hitter has his sights clearly set on helping the defending World Series champions get back into the playoffs.

Boston led the wild-card race by a game over Minnesota entering the final week of August, thanks in large part to a breakthrough season from their first baseman, who had already set career highs with 24 home runs and 89 runs batted in, with five weeks still left to play.

The starting first baseman at this year's All-Star game was tied with teammate Dustin Pedroia for third in the league, hitting .318, was tied for ninth with 34 doubles and ranked fifth with a .568 slugging percentage. He also ranked among the league leaders with 62 extra-base hits and a .383 on-base percentage.

His key offensive contributions have kept the Red Sox in the hunt for post-season play in a year in which they lost designated hitter David Ortiz for nearly two months with a left wrist injury, third baseman Mike Lowell to a pair of stints on the disabled list, and traded their big bopper, Manny Ramirez, to the Dodgers.

"As you mature in age and in this game you have to keep trying to get better and learning and I think I have been," Youkilis said prior to a recent series in Toronto, where he made his major-league debut four years ago, homering off of Pat Hentgen in his second career at-bat.

Kevin Youkilis

"My family, fiancée [Enza Sambataro] and her son Michael are more than half the reason I am doing well. Having a backbone, people to love me through the hard times and good times. That is probably the greatest thing I have."

The Red Sox's eighth round draft pick in 2001, Youkilis has also excelled defensively the past couple of seasons, winning a gold glove last year with a perfect 1.000 fielding percentage at first base and setting a major-league record for most consecutive error-less games at the position.

An unassisted game-ending put-out on April 2 broke Steve Garvey's record of 193 games. The streak, which started July 4, 2006 ended at 238 games on June 7 against Seattle.

A third baseman when he arrived in the big leagues, Youkilis took over at first base at the start of the 2006 season. He did make three errors at the hot corner in 2007.

But he said it's great to look back on the streak and he takes a lot of pride in what he accomplished.

"I still can't believe I didn't make one error," he said "I was very fortunate. It was an unbelievable year.

"You get one bad hop, the ball might hit you funny or kick the wrong way, you can make an error that easy The key was doing repetition, trying to position yourself in the right way."

The 29-year-old Cincinnati native was raised in a conservative Jewish home and had a bar mitzvah, while also attending Hebrew school. He said he tries to be a better person by doing charitable work and being a family man.

Last fall, Youkilis launched his charity, Hits for Kids, an organization that funds underprivileged children in the New England area.

Following last year's World Series victory, he shaved his goatee in exchange for a $5,000 donation by Gillette to his foundation.

His charity wine, SauvignYoooouuuk Blanc, a California Sauvignon Blanc, came out earlier this year and supports Hits for Kids.

NBA's only Jewish player holds hoops clinic in Israel for kids

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The NBA's only Jewish player was in southern Israel recently where he conducted a clinic for Jewish and Palestinian children.

Jordan Farmar, a guard for the Los Angeles Lakers, was in Israel in co-operation with the Peres Center for Peace. Farmar, 21, also led a workshop for Jewish and Palestinian girls during his eight-day visit.

Israeli women's basketball star Limor Mizrahi, who is related to Farmar, also participated in the workshop.

Farmar, a former standout at the University of California, Los Angeles, is in his second season playing in the NBA.

The Peres Center's Twinned Peace Sports Schools are open to Jewish and Palestinian children aged six to 13 from 35 separate schools. They host joint Israeli-Palestinian sports contests every month.

The bridal vigilante

ALMOST FAMOUS

BY JACOB MEDJUCK

Global warming must be true – the human herd is indeed thinning. Specifically, among my camp friends.

I'm not the most socially conscious person, but I've tried to live by the Torah, the food pyramid and the Five Books of Cosby. Lately, however, it seems that nature is striking vindictively at my age group; my childhood friends are slipping into extinction. Every so often I turn .and another one is gone – married, moved or pregnant.

I've been burned by marriage before – not my own, but yours! You hook up, shack up and disappear. So be forewarned, I may love you all, but to protect a lifetime of chevra, I care enough to ruin all of your weddings.

My public blunders, which we excused as "mistakes," were calculated efforts to sabotage your nuptials. I'm not petty or jealous. I'm committed – to our friendship. And I've lost too many "brothers" to let you "drink the Kool-Aid" under the chupah anymore. I will knock over your flowers. Cough during your ceremony. And tap my glass during all of your speeches. I shall overcome.

I found myself in an interesting spot last weekend. My best friend from university, the groom, called up and asked me to speak at his wedding. Fantastic.

Minutes later his bride, brother-in-law, her parents, his parents and my parents called to ask me not to speak.

It seemed some manner of reputation had preceded me. I'd officially become the kippot crusader, a bridal vigilante. Groomsmen, shine your lights skyward, and I will come to aid you. With a microphone in hand, I menace like Batman and mumble like an infant. I am widely feared and completely foolish. I will have my cake and eat it, too. I will have your cake, also. I am that guy. I've just lost too many friends to act with remorse.

So, I found myself at the reception having not slept in three days. I'd worked straight through, then driven to the airport for the nine-hour flight home. I landed, showered and went to the reception, where I was literally handed a poorly balanced plate of meatballs and a microphone – a troubling combination for the all-nighter child. I begged patience from the crowd as the words came to me from pickled angels up above.

Riffing a nuptial toast on no sleep has been the most originally vindictive transaction of my crusading efforts to date. Sincerely, I offered to pass, but the families relented and insisted on giving me the "honour." Heaven help us.

Sans sleep, I am hazardously without filter. I will fingerpaint with words – often articulating just the middle-finger painter. Before finishing, I recall having offered three things: I wished the couple great success, everlasting health and that the groom wanted to build a time machine in university to travel back to the 1970s to fool around with my mother.

Also, after acknowledging that 50 per cent of all marriages end in divorce, it seemed logical to point out that the other marriages end in death – and I may have then wished the happy couple death.

Sensing I'd hit my PowerPoint stride, I collected the meatballs at my feet and went back to my table, cutting across a mixed minefield of applause and horrified cousins. Certainly not the "best man," but the best man for the job.

Beautiful brides beware – reduce, reuse and recycle. Marry the boys you grew up with and leave my forest alone. Unless you plan to plant new friends in my old-growth neighbourhood, stop cutting down my childhood brothers and using them to ornament your bed, bath and beyond-my-district homes. That – or introduce me to your bridesmaids.

HONEY ROASTED RED POTATOES

1 lb. red potatoes, quartered
2 tblsp. diced onion
2 tblsp. butter, melted

Making your workouts fun

FITNESS CORNER

BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Making your workouts fun isn't as hard as it sounds. Most people look at me with disbelief when I say that, but the truth is, if you want results, you have to make working out a part of your life.

We have learned that regular exercise not only increases our longevity, it also improves our quality of life, no matter what age we are.

There are many different ways of making your workouts fun. The easiest is to find an exercise you like and do it every day for at least 30 minutes, whether it's walking, roller blading or riding a bike.

Many people find working out with a friend is a great way to get fit, stay social and have fun. Not only can the company make the time fly, but your buddy also motivates you before, during and after the workout. I also find that when you grab a friend and begin a workout regime together, you help each other with the nutrition part as well.

Hiring a personal trainer with a friend or two to create your own small class is another wonderful way of having fun while you work out in the privacy of your own home. I have lots of clients who work out in pairs, and we have a blast while sweating it up.

Joining a group fitness facility – they are popping up everywhere as an alternative to big overcrowded gyms – is another great way to keep motivated and have fun. These facilities offer many different types of classes at different fitness levels, often in a small class setting. Classes may be offered in such activities as pilates, yoga and kick-boxing. Some facilities even meet at parks around the city to get you outside.

I find, too, that when I want a fast, hard workout I don't need to think about, I put in an exercise DVD and just do it. The next thing I know, I'm done.

So go grab a friend and start something great together. If you have any questions or comments, please e-mail me at felycesfitness@rogers.com

About Nutrition

Dealing with lactose intolerance

Q. I am lactose intolerant, and I am wondering if I can consume only dairy products that are labelled lactose free?

A. If you are lactose intolerant, you actually have a lot of options. Many people assume they can't eat any dairy products, but that is simply not the case.

First, many people with lactose intolerance do quite well consuming any or all of their favourite dairy foods, as long as they take a lactase pill first. The lactase enzyme will assist in the digestion of the food. This, however, is a very individual thing – different people will find they can tolerate some foods and not others, or they may be able to have a certain quantity of dairy foods before experiencing symptoms, even with the pills, so there is a bit of trial and error.

Lisa Weinberg

You can also eat some foods without taking the lactase enzyme, as they are already lactose free. All yogurt, soft or frozen, is lactose free – the bacteria used to make yogurt naturally renders the yogurt lactose free. Aged cheddar cheese – in the aging process – also becomes lactose free. Soy milk and other soy milk products are lactose free, as are the many products made from lactose free milk.

But watch for hidden dairy or lactose in many foods. Lactose, which is often used as an actual ingredient, is a sugar, but it contains dairy and can be found in many foods, including hot dogs, breaded foods, drugs and vitamins, flavoured snack foods like chips, crackers and chocolate, among other things.

Q. I was just diagnosed with diverticulitis. What is this, and what do I have to eat to manage it?

A. Diverticulitis is a disease typically associated with people who have historically consumed a low-fibre diet. Although there is no anatomical abnormality present, a high-fibre diet is usually required. While you may have been accustomed to a relatively low-fibre regimen to date, most people willingly convert to a high-fibre diet to prevent the pain or attacks associated with this disease.

So what is required in this diet? The most important thing is to always consult your physician first. For many people, bowel rest may be necessary initially. Then, it is best to generally increase your intake of soluble fibre, striving for approximately 25 grams of fibre per day. Soluble fibre is the type of fibre that bulks and swells in water and acts like a sponge. This fibre makes a heavier, bulkier stool, which increases elimination and relieves constipation and diverticulitis. Remember though, any time you are increasing fibre in your diet, you must also increase your water consumption. They need to go together. Sources of soluble fibre include wheat bran, whole grains and the skins of many fruits and vegetables.

Another school of thought on diverticulitis includes avoiding nuts, seeds and corn as well, although there seems to be little scientific research to back up this finding. However, your health-care provider may recommend that this is best for you.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

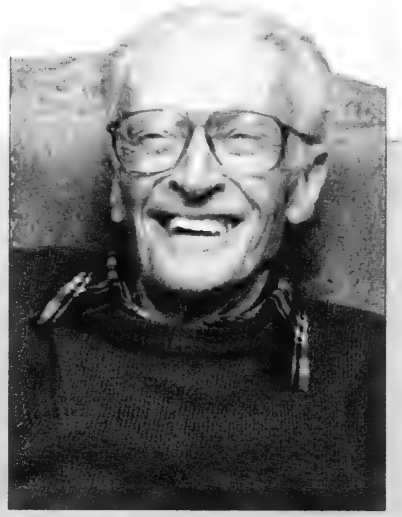
WILL RETURN

Because...



...I want others to receive the same kind of care and attention Mount Sinai gives me.

— Norman Roth

For Norman Roth, going to Mount Sinai is like going home, literally. Mr. Roth grew up in a house at 17 Murray Street, now the site of the Hospital's Murray Street entrance. When Mr. Roth goes up the escalator to see his doctor, he relives the days when, on that very spot, he played basketball and hockey with his childhood friends.

But Mr. Roth's reasons for choosing to leave a legacy to Mount Sinai are inspired by more recent memories. "The nurses and doctors are wonderful," he says. "Mount Sinai is a smart hospital that saves lives, and it saved mine."

Mr. Roth's legacy gift is his way of giving back to a Hospital that has always been there for him and his family. "It's close to my heart," he says.

You can make a difference to the health care of future generations. To learn more about including Mount Sinai in your legacy, or to share your story, please contact us.

Federal election called for Oct. 14

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

As the stirring U.S. electoral campaign enters the home stretch and Israel looks as if it may go to the polls, election fever has also gripped Parliament Hill.

On Sunday, Prime Minister Stephen Harper asked Gov. Gen. Michaëlle Jean to dissolve Parliament, saying it was at its "useful end," and he set an election date of Oct. 14, which also happens to be the first day of Sukkot.

Conflict with Sukkot minimized

Last month, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), acting on rumours of a possible Sukkot election date, sent an e-mail to the Harper government to let it know that an Oct. 14 election date would pose a serious problem for religiously observant Jewish voters.

"A vote that day would adversely affect the Jewish electorate and the ability of our community to volunteer on campaigns and for Elections Canada," Congress CEO Bernie Farber wrote on the organization's website. "Our respectful request... was to bear this in mind when deciding on an election date and avoid Oct. 14 if possible."

According to Congress, Harper called its co-president, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, to explain the rationale for setting the date and express "a sincere understanding" of the Jewish community's situation vis-a-vis the vote.

"We know Prime Minister Harper is a man of faith, and understand the challenges he must have faced in determining a date for the election," Rabbi Bulka said.

Rabbi Bulka added that Congress will inform the community on alternate ways they can vote, which include going to advance polls and registering to vote at any Elections Canada office during the campaign.

Prior to the call, in what some considered pre-election pork-barrelling, Harper doled out tens of millions of dollars to recipients including Ontario's flagging auto industry, and the City of Toronto to combat gang violence, and promised nearly $5 billion to Quebec for its aging highway infrastructure, among other spending pledges.

Meanwhile, Liberal Leader Stéphane Dion was touting his much-discussed "Green Shift" plan, promising $900 million in incentives to help the country's farmers, truckers and other industries if a Liberal government is elected.

El Al downplays reported terrorist threat

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian general manager of El Al Israel Airlines is downplaying an Israeli news report that suggested the airline's personnel were being followed by Hezbollah terrorists in Toronto.

Dinah Kutner said that "it's been blown out of proportion. A lot of things being reported are not accurate."

Kutner declined to comment on the specifics of the story, saying, "It's a security issue."

The item originated with Channel 2, a private television station in Israel. It reported a Hezbollah terror cell tracked El Al flight crews in Toronto as part of a plan to attack them. It also reported the cell had been arrested and the terror alert level for Israelis had been raised to the highest level.

At the same time, the Israeli daily, Ha'aretz, reported that the suspected terrorists were seen at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto, where El Al pilots and crew stay between flights.

Those reports came only a few weeks after Israel's counterterrorism bureau issued a worldwide travel advisory warning Israelis

Ex-envoy Dies

TORONTO — Gideon Saguy, Israel's former consul general in Toronto, died Aug. 5 in Toronto of melanoma. He was 88. The Austrian-born Saguy, who was in the Israel Defence Forces from 1948 to 1951, also served as the first spokesperson for Israel's foreign affairs ministry, as Israel's first ambassador to Jamaica, as consul general in San Francisco, in Israel's embassy in London and at its consulate in New York. He was consul general in Toronto from 1982 to 1986. He then spent five years as president of the Tel Aviv Foundation in Canada. He was buried in Tel Aviv.

Scrolls Recovered

NEW YORK — Eight Torah scrolls stolen from a New York City shul were recovered. Police arrested a maintenance worker and another person Sept. 4 on charges of criminal possession of stolen property. The scrolls, valued at $500,000, were stolen last month from the Jewish Center of Kew Gardens Hills in Queens.

Evangelism Affirmed

BERLIN — Evangelical scholars have released a statement renewing the commitment to Jewish evangelism in Europe. The theological arm of the World Evangelical Alliance issued the 1,200-word Berlin Declaration one week after an Aug. 18-22 conference on how to bring the Christian gospel to Jews in Europe, the Christian Post reported. The document was written by 13 scholars of the World Evangelical Alliance Theological Commission, seminaries and other groups. Christians and messianic Jews in Germany also helped to write it. "While respecting the views of others, we still challenge them to consider the message of the messiah," said the declaration, which isn't an official alliance document, but is being widely circulated.

Hechsher Endorsed

NEW YORK — The Reform movement's rabbinical association endorsed the Conservative movement's ethical kosher initiative. The board of trustees of the Central Conference of American Rabbis resolved last month to explore ways to co-operate with the initiative, known as Hekhsher Tzedek, which grew out of an immigration raid last May at the Agriprocessors kosher meatpacking plant in Iowa. The conference urged producers of kosher meat to adhere to the highest ethical standards, applauded the Conservative movement for integrating ethical concerns into kashrut and encouraged Reform Jews to consider the initiative's guidelines in making dietary choices.

Revocation Upheld

CINCINNATI — A Cincinnati court on Sept. 4 upheld a decision to revoke the U.S. citizenship of a Michigan man accused of shooting Jews when he was in a Nazi unit. The ruling upholds a decision last year that John Kalymon, 87, was ineligible for U.S. citizenship because of his service in the Nazi-operated Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, which was involved in deporting and killing Jews. Kalymon had appealed that ruling.

Nefesh B'Nefesh Takes Greater Aliyah Role

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency has agreed to an official collaboration on North American aliyah with Nefesh B'Nefesh, which facilitates immigration to Israel from English-speaking countries.

The organizations announced Aug. 31 that under an agreement signed last month, Nefesh B'Nefesh will have primary responsibility for marketing and promotion, while the Jewish Agency will remain responsible for determining aliyah eligibility with other Israeli authorities and will pay the airfare of each new immigrant. The organizations have been competing with each other for several years.

Future olim from the United States and Canada can apply for both Nefesh B'Nefesh services and the Jewish Agency aliyah eligibility process using one application through Nefesh B'Nefesh.

The Jewish Agency will continue to maintain aliyah emissaries in North America, but as a result of the collaborative venture and Nefesh B'Nefesh's use of web-based marketing and communications to promote aliyah, it will be able to curtail the scope of this function in the future.

No Jewish Agency emissaries currently serving in North America will be returned to Israel prior to the completion of their contract, the agency said. The agency will continue to offer services to all those eligible to immigrate under the Law of Return, including those who do not fall under the umbrella of the joint venture with Nefesh B'Nefesh, an agency spokesperson said.

Jewish Agency chair Zeev Bielski said the deal will increase North American aliyah, while Tony Gelbart, co-founder and chair of Nefesh B'Nefesh, said his agency's "enhanced" role will let it "further fulfil [its] mission of making aliyah as seamless and successful as possible."

Wiesenthal Center unites Natives, non-Natives

-By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The town of Deseronto, Ont., has been in the news for all the wrong reasons. Protests, unresolved land claims, racial tension, violent demonstrations, police interventions.

Sort of like Caledonia, Ont., only farther east.

Last weekend, about 25 people from both hot spots boarded a flight to Los Angeles to attend 2-1/2 days of lectures, tours and seminars designed to build bridges, foster relationships and be exposed to the unique brand of fostering better communities developed by Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC).

The group includes aboriginals and non-aboriginals, police, educators, representatives of the provincial government and community leaders. They hail from Stoney and Kettle Point Sarnia bands, the Tyndenaga-Deseronto area (about 30 kilometres west of Kingston) and from the Six Nations and Caledonia.

Their itinerary includes a visit to the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Museum of Tolerance, where they will discuss the Holocaust and racism, followed by workshops to discuss ways of addressing racial hatred.

In Toronto, FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo had been approached by residents of Caledonia eager for help in finding a resolution to their conflict. Benlolo said he was resistant at first, because he didn't want the Friends to get in the middle of a nasty political fight. But with increasing evidence of racial hatred, the FSWC decided it would do what it could to help those who wanted to restore some normalcy to the situation.

Vic Roy

Wiesenthal Center facilitators will bring the participants together to help tackle these issues, including the ones that have proven so difficult in their local communities, Benlolo said.

The goal is to "foster stronger relationships and when they return to Ontario, to have better rapport and the ability to solve problems," he added.

Vic Roy was enthusiastic about the trip, and the possibility it may give him the tools to tackle some difficult home-grown issues. As principal of Deseronto Public School, he's been in the middle of a long-simmering dispute – both literally and figuratively.

The school, he said, educates 170 children, a quarter of whom are of aboriginal origin. Some of the tension in the community has been reflected inside the school, where he's witnessed "real racist comments" directed at school staff.

What's more, "the school is right in the middle of the disputed land," Roy said.

"I'm in the middle of the divide in the community," he added, noting that his students include children of OPP officers, as well as children of those manning the blockade.

Roy, who attended an orientation workshop at the FSWC's Toronto headquarters last month, said he was impressed with Benlolo's overarching theme of trying to make the world a better place. Deseronto is "a respect school," where aboriginal culture is taught and where murals push the message of respect.

The Los Angeles experience "is an opportunity for dialogue and planning," he added.

As a condition of the trip, Roy agreed to devise a year-long plan to develop a tolerance plan for the school.

"I would like to see us come back with a more involved plan for kids to work together better and set an example to the community," he said.

'Compelled by the truth'

This article is the first in an occasional series featuring scholars who reside and work among us in the intellectually diverse, creative and very expressive Jewish community of Canada.

From the editor's desk

At the first mention in our conversation of the name Rambam (the millennia-entrenched acronym for the revered Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon), known more formally outside the Jewish world as Maimonides, a wave of enthusiasm washes across the lean, earnest countenance of James Diamond. He inclines closer to me across the small table of the coffee shop where we are sitting, in order to punctuate with sweeping hands a point about the importance for Judaism of fearless intellectual inquiry.

"I believe in things," Diamond says, referring to the core precepts and principles of Judaism, "but I am very open to thinking about ideas and the idea of new ideas. There is room within Jewish thought to explore and to test and to question and to challenge," he adds emphatically.

"I do my research and investigate because I am compelled by the truth."

James A. Diamond

The conviction in his voice is nearly anthem-like. The excitement in his demeanour is pleasing to behold.

Converts, Heretics and Lepers: Maimonides and the Outsider (University of Notre Dame Press, Notre Dame, Indiana, 2007) is the most recent product of Diamond's meticulous, exhausting research.

It is the second book Diamond has written on Maimonides. The first, published five years ago in 2003, was titled Maimonides and the Hermeneutics of Concealment (SUNY Press, New York, 2003). Both works were awarded Canadian Jewish Book Awards for scholarship.

It is fair to say that a great deal of Diamond's adult life has been spent penetrating, wrestling with, understanding and conveying the thought of the seminal 12th-century Jewish philosopher and thinker.

"It has been almost like spending one's entire life to open oneself to the tradition so that only then does it becomes your own," Diamond said of his perseverance with the writings of the Rambam.

"You take the scholars more seriously by questioning and by challenging as they did, by trying to go through the same hard work they went through to master their subject."

But it is only in the past 10 years that Diamond has been "challenging and questioning" in the halls of academia. Diamond, an associate professor and the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo, received his doctorate in Jewish studies in 1999, specifically in the thought of Maimonides. He began teaching the next year and has been there ever since.

Prior to his arrival at Waterloo University, Diamond practised law in Toronto for almost 20 years. In the midst of his legal career, he returned to the University of Toronto, his alma mater, to commence a formal program of Jewish studies. He began those studies under the mentoring eye of the late Frank Talmadge and completed them with David Novak.

Though he pursued intensive, scholarly Jewish studies at University of Toronto only "later in life," so to speak, Jewish studies had always been his natural, even home domain.

Born into an observant home in Toronto just past the midpoint of the last century, Diamond is the middle of three brothers, sons of survivors who found their way to a new life in Canada after the war.

His formal education was a "Yeshivish" one that began in the Eitz Chaim day schools in Toronto and led eventually to a beit midrash in Jerusalem.

But the yeshiva was not the anchor for his learning, rather it was the ship that carried him from one harbour of intellectual exploration to another.

Diamond found his intellectual ballast in his father's home and the behaviour toward God and man that his father exemplified.

Diamond described the home in which he was raised as liberal Mizrachi (combining religious observance and support for Zionism). Indeed, he described his father and the tight-knit, argumentative, ideologically oriented group of chaverim, comrades, at Toronto's Torah v'Avodah Synagogue as being among the key formative influences in his life.

His teacher at the yeshiva in Jerusalem, Reb Yohanan Zweig and Prof. Emil Fackenheim, he said, were the other key influences on his thought and his life.

"Reb Zweig thought outside the box and taught to never be afraid to search and question. Emil Fackenheim was the first to speak to me about the whole world of philosophy, including, of course, Jewish philosophers."

Diamond is now studying and researching the writings of the 13th-century philosopher, scholar, thinker, Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman, the Ramban, whom he described as an intellectual counterpoint to the Rambam.

In his research and writing, Diamond seeks the truth according to the instruction of the very individuals in whose works and insights he labours – respectfully, yet fearlessly questioning.

I imagine that he hopes his own work will one day be studied in the same way. That would be his greatest reward.

–MBD

SPIRITUAL ZIONIST, MAN OF ACTION

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook was the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi in the Land of Israel during British Mandatory rule. Born in Latvia in 1865, he came to Palestine in 1904 to be chief rabbi of Jaffa.

Rabbi Kook viewed the Jewish return to Israel as an event of great theological and historical significance that was perhaps even more important that its political significance. In Rabbi Kook's view, all Jews, secular and observant, were instrumental in the Divine plan for the Jewish return to the Land of Israel. Thus, he accepted all Jews as long as they identified themselves as Jews. All his life, he fought for reconciliation and understanding among Jews. He died 73 years ago, in 1935, on the third day of Elul (which this year falls on Sept.4).

Accounting Rocks

On the surface accounting may appear to be just crunching numbers, doing spreadsheets, and getting taxes filed. At SLF accounting is certainly about doing the math and definitely about looking after the complexities of the tax systems in Canada and the US, but beyond the numbers there is a great more to SLF.

We strive to be extremely hands-on with our clients in order to offer them the full services that are equal to those of the Big 4 only in a more customized way. Efficiency and lower overheads do equal lower fees, but behind the numbers SLF is about people and clients working together to bring a tailored, customized solution in any and all accounting related situations.

SLF remains as single-minded in our pursuit of success for our clients as we have been since our inception in 1935. To find out how SLF can get accounting rocking for you call one of the following SLF partners in Toronto at 416.785.5353:

B'nai Brith faces human rights complaint

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A complaint against B'nai Brith Canada that has dragged on for five years points to the need to reform the procedures of human rights commissions across the country, B'nai Brith said in a brief released last week.

The complaint against the human rights organization was one of the motivating factors for it to advocate change to procedures behind the work of human rights commissions across the country, acknowledged B'nai Brith senior legal counsel David Matas. B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights has submitted a brief to Richard Moon, a law professor who is reviewing the Canadian Human Rights Commission's mandate to address hate speech.

B'nai Brith has long advocated for the necessity of provincial and federal human rights legislation to address hate speech. Being on the receiving end of a complaint permits the organization "to see it from both sides," Matas said.

B'nai Brith was the subject of a complaint by Shahina Siddiqui, executive director of the Islamic Social Service Association of the United States and Canada, following an October 2003 conference in Winnipeg hosted by B'nai Brith for first responders to terrorist attacks. The complaint, filed with the Manitoba Human Rights Commission (MHRC), alleged comments made at the meeting were biased against Muslims.

Matas noted, however, that Siddiqui did not attend the conference but relied on reports from unnamed sources. Despite the lapse of several years, B'nai Brith still doesn't know who was the source of the allegations and what specifically was said, he added.

B'nai Brith has asked the commission for more information and received a letter "with general statements with a word or two but no quoted sentences." Its own investigation turned up nothing that could be taken as violating Manitoba's anti-discrimination laws.

"It's shadow boxing, trying to find out if a rumour is true," Matas said.

The MHRC has appointed an independent expert to look into the case, but Matas said he doesn't know who the expert is and B'nai Brith hasn't been asked for input into his investigation.

The investigator has been given documents that relate to the complaint, but B'nai Brith hasn't been shown them. B'nai Brith has been told that it can respond to the report when it comes out, but Matas contends that could be too late.

"The findings could be definitive of the issue," he said.

B'nai Brith's experience, as well as the cases involving journalist and author Mark Steyn, Maclean's magazine and the defunct Western Standard magazine, indicate the need for substantial procedural reforms in human rights cases, he said.

B'nai Brith doesn't want human rights commissions abolished. "There is a problem, we need reform but the jurisdictions [over hate speech] are worth keeping," he said.

Commissions have developed "without a full range of procedural safeguards, with informality. That was not a problem until a series of abusive complaints," Matas said.

In its brief to Moon, BBC warns that human rights commissions are unprepared and ill-equipped to deal with ideological complaints driven by political Islam.

B'nai Brith has urged reforms that include limiting complaints to a single jurisdiction, awarding costs against those who attempt to abuse the system by harassing "bona fide respondents" and educating investigators on the "get-political context within which they operate."

The burdens and the duties of democracy

In the end, the announcement came without drama or surprise. Prime Minister Stephen Harper Sunday morning visited the Gov-Gen. Michaëlle Jean at her residence. They spoke privately for some 20 minutes. The conversation was probably more about the summer's pastime rather than a writ for an upcoming election. The prime minister then emerged from the meeting and announced to the waiting assembly of reporters what they and the entire population of Canada already knew.

There will be a federal election on Tuesday, Oct. 14.

For the Jewish community, the date is unfortunate. It falls on the first day of Sukkot, one of the three pilgrimage holidays of the Jewish calendar. Observant Jews will not be able to participate in the election on that day. It was a conflict of scheduling, apparently, that the prime minister felt he could not avoid. And he took pains to explain that to various leaders of the community.

However, Jews intent on voting will have no difficulty in doing so. As is the case in all elections, there will be sufficient opportunity and one imagines, too, sufficient convenience, to cast one's ballot at the advance polls.

And as is also the case in all elections, we urge every eligible voter, as a matter of duty, to make the time to go to the polls and vote. That is the very minimum that our democracy needs, if not also, expects of us.

Beyond the minimum, there are, as our readers know, more robust ways to fulfil democracy's needs, all of which hinge upon personal involvement in the larger electoral process.

Such involvement can be in one of two ways, or both. It can be on behalf of a candidate (or party) to help press his or her worthiness upon fellow voters. Or it can be on behalf of a cause (a communal concern) to help press its worthiness upon the candidates. In either case, the voter must turn away from indifference and apathy and step instead toward caring and commitment. As the record of Canadian public and civic life shows, the Jewish community has well-established credentials in political activism, caring and commitment.

As our readers also know, this newspaper will not advocate on behalf of one party or any candidates.

The well-being and good governance of Canada, including as a high priority, its foreign affairs, concern us all. The Jews of Canada are a diverse group. We are decidedly not monolithic in our party politics, philosophies and preferences. We manifest our activism and commitment in wide and varied ways, each according to conscience.

Such are the burdens and the duties of democracy that the more we become involved, the better it serves all people, and the better it serves all people, the stronger our democracy becomes.

25 years ago in The CJN

For the first time, a delegation from the Israel labour organization Histadrut visited Ontario. The visit was a direct response to a resolution passed at an Ontario Federation of Labour convention that called for the recognition of the PLO and the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Dry Bones CONSPIRACY?

School fees exceed rate of inflation

Once again we learn that tuition fees have risen "often at amounts that exceed the rate of inflation," this despite previous reassurances from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto officials that additional, significant infusions of funds dedicated to Jewish education were made this year that would lower tuitions this year ("Jewish day school fees rise by up to 10 per cent," CJN, Aug. 28). In some cases, Jewish day school fees have risen by up to 10 per cent. This is clearly an intolerable situation, a crisis of epic proportions that requires immediate and determined consideration by the community at large.

Yet our leadership has resorted to its usual and predictable refrain, indicating that they are trying their best to increase allocations for subsidies for hardworking middle-class families. Given its poor track record to date – where our tuition increases have largely surpassed the rate of inflation on an annual basis for the past number of decades – trying is no longer good enough. I worry that our children and grandchildren will not be in a position to afford a Jewish education for their children. By my simple calculation, utilizing a five per cent average increase year after year, our family will be paying more than $30,000 toward the cost of our youngest child's Grade 12 high school education alone. Two Jewish schools have closed this past year and without some considerable intervention, more are destined to do the same. Without the possibility of an affordable Jewish education, our future looks dim, and I venture that our newly built and renovated Toronto Jewish community centres will not serve as a satisfactory substitute. We require immediate and creative solutions to this serious problem, or we will all surely suffer the dire consequences.

Dry Bones DOUBLE TROUBLE

Day school funding

Jerrold Landau is undoubtedly correct in forecasting that the Ontario Jewish population will decline because of the cost of Jewish education ("Toronto community may decline," CJN letters, Aug. 28). But there is a further point: why would anyone wish to live in a jurisdiction that studiously avoids conforming to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights? Since 1999, Ontarians have known that civilized countries do not discriminate in funding non-public education, but the best the Ontario government can do is engage in denial. It repeatedly relies on an outdated constitution to justify discrimination, but it makes no effort to change the constitution.

Obama another Chamberlain

Democratic presidential candidate U.S. Senator Barack Obama appears to be a potential Neville Chamberlain of our time. Obama has said that he would sit, discuss and arrange accords with leaders such Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran. Talk about naiveté! ("Obama woos Jews in race for White House," CJN, Aug. 28)

Chamberlain, the prime minister of England, did the very same thing with Adolf Hitler of Germany. We all know the results of that sit-down – World War II and the Holocaust. History gives great lessons, and it often repeats itself unless attention is paid to it and the lessons learned.

Bat mitzvah project

My bat mitzvah is on Jan. 24, 2009, and for my bat mitzvah project, I am creating a website (www.myjewishlegacy.com) so that our generation can share the stories of Holocaust survivors. I decided to make this website because I wanted our generation to have a place to document the journeys and experiences their families had to endure. Learning about my grandparents who survived the Holocaust made me feel proud to be a Jew. I hope the website will keep the memories alive.

I spent an afternoon interviewing my grandpa, Bert, and heard about his travels from the age of 10. There came a time when he could no longer go to school in Germany. His family lived on the Swiss border, and his family was able to arrange for him and his sister to go to school in Switzerland. He would ride his bike to school, and he hid documents and money (also the deed to the house in Germany) on these rides and gave these items to a teacher in Switzerland to hold for the Bodenheimer family. Every day, the police would flag him over the border, but on the ride home, they would stop him, search his belongings, and even take a tire off his bicycle to make sure he wasn't smuggling anything into the country. They never thought he would smuggle items out. It was very dangerous to do this, but my grandfather was a very determined, smart and brave person. His Jewish identity was one of the most important aspects of his being.

Through my bat mitzvah project, I hope our generation learns more about the Holocaust and that we will never forget what happened.

'Enough of blood and tears'

Fifteen years ago this week, on Sept. 13, 1993, hope for peace between Israelis and Palestinians soared even higher than the white tufts of clouds that decorated the deep blue sky above Washington, D.C. that day.

U.S. president Bill Clinton had gathered on the lawn of the White House Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's foreign minister Shimon Peres and PLO leader Yasser Arafat, for a public signing of a declaration of priniciples for peace between the two peoples, based on discussions in Oslo, Norway.

Before an assembly of dignitaries on the White House lawn and with millions of viewers watching on television, the Israeli and Palestinian leaders committed themselves to finding a way to come to a peace agreement. Yasser Arafat committed himself to the abject rejection of violence.

The following are the remarks delivered by Rabin on that occasion. Despite the failure of the process, they remain one of the most eloquent expressions of Israel's deep yearning for peace ever expressed by its leaders.

Two years and two months after he delivered these remarks, Yitzhak Rabin was cut down by a Jewish murderer.

The possibility of peace with that generation of the Palestinian people had been cut down long before the murder. It was struck down by the dishonesty, deceit and dissembling of the PLO leader.

The dream of peace, however, must not be cut down.

Yitzhak Rabin's words must be planted in the hearts of all peoples who genuinely yearn and strive for peace.

Israel's Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin speaking on the White House lawn Sept. 13, 1993. [Israel Government archives]

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

This signing of the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles here today is not so easy – neither for myself as a soldier in Israel's wars, nor for the people of Israel, nor for the Jewish people in the Diaspora who are watching us now with great hope, mixed with apprehension. It is certainly not easy for the families of the victims of the wars, the violence and the terror, whose pain will never heal. For the many thousands who have defended our lives with their own, and even sacrificed their lives for our own, for them, this ceremony has come too late. Today, on the eve of an opportunity, an opportunity for peace and perhaps an end of violence and wars, we remember each and every one of them with everlasting love.

We have come from Jerusalem, the ancient and eternal capital of the Jewish people. We have come from an anguished and grieving land. We have come from a people, a home, a family, that has not known a single year, not a single month, in which mothers have not wept for their sons. We have come to try and put an end to the hostilities, so that our children and our children's children, will no longer experience the painful cost of war, violence and terror. We have come to secure their lives and to ease the sorrow and the painful memories of the past, to hope and pray for peace.

Let me say to you, the Palestinians, that we are destined to live together on the same soil, in the same land. We, the soldiers who have returned from battle stained with blood, we who have seen our relatives and friends killed before our eyes, we who have attended their funerals and cannot look into the eyes of their parents, we who have come from a land where parents bury their children, we who have fought against you, the Palestinians, we say to you today in a loud and a clear voice: "Enough of blood and tears. Enough. We have no desire for revenge. We harbour no hatred toward you. We, like you, are people, people who want to build a home, to plant a tree, to love, to live side by side with you in dignity, in empathy, as human beings, as free men. We are today giving peace a chance, and saying again to you – enough."

Let us pray that a day will come when we all will say farewell to the arms.

We wish to open a new chapter in the sad book of our lives together, a chapter of mutual recognition, of good neighbourliness, of mutual respect, of understanding. We hope to embark on a new era in the history of the Middle East. Today, here in Washington, at the White House, we will begin a new reckoning in relations between peoples, between parents tired of war, between children who will not know war.

President of the United States, ladies and gentlemen, our inner strength, our high moral values, have been derived for thousands of years from the Book of Books, in one of which, Kohelet (Ecclesiastes), we read:

To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven:
A time to be born, and a time to die;
A time to kill, and a time to heal;
A time to weep and a time to laugh;
A time to love, and a time to hate;
A time of war, and a time of peace.'

Ladies and gentlemen, the time for peace has come.

In two days, the Jewish people will celebrate the beginning of a new year. I believe, I hope, I pray, that the new year will bring a message of redemption for all peoples, a good year for you, for all of you. A good year for Israelis and Palestinians. A good year for all the peoples of the Middle East. A good year for our American friends who so want peace and are helping to achieve it, for presidents and members of previous administrations, especially for you, President Clinton, and your staff, for all citizens of the world. May peace come to all your homes.

In the Jewish tradition, it is customary to conclude our prayers with the word "amen." With your permission, men of peace, I shall conclude with words taken from the prayer recited by Jews daily, and I would ask the entire audience to join me in saying, "Amen."

"He maketh peace in His high places. He shall make peace for us and for all of Israel. And they shall say: 'Amen.'"

The above was translated from Hebrew.

A fight we must win

"Branding" is one of those intriguingly complex words that can have opposite meaning, depending on its context. The dictionaries tell us that the word can be used in reference to a trademark or a distinctive name that identifies a product or company. On the other hand, it can be used as a way to mark someone or something with disgrace or disapproval – with a stigma of one sort or another.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

In the positive sense, the "Brand Israel" campaign that has just begun in Toronto under the stewardship of Consul General Amir Gissin is to be applauded. The initiative is, in fact, part of a much wider public relations project by the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs to promote Israel in a positive light, both because of the intrinsic worthiness of doing so, but perhaps even more importantly as a way to counter the vilification and attempted delegitimization of the Jewish state that has gained such strength over the past several years.

Toronto has been selected as the test market for this important promotional strategy, and what happens there will likely set the stage for what might be anticipated when the project reaches other cities around the globe.

A focus on Israeli achievements "beyond the conflict" – in the arts, sciences, medicine, technology and business – has often been a launch point for Israeli hasbarah. But, for a variety of reasons, the essential messaging has never really gained much traction, and, by measurable endpoints, perspectives on Israel have not really changed for the better because of them.

Hopefully, this initiative – with its boldness and sophistication – will usher in an exciting new era of success for those who so dearly wish to see Israel fairly portrayed, and properly recognized, on the world stage.

Regrettably, however, the other sort of branding – with its stigmatizations and accusations of malfeasance – has already begun to emerge in reaction to the "Brand Israel" campaign.

On Aug. 25, about 100 protesters gathered outside the Miles Nadal JCC in Toronto to voice their opposition to the project. Representing the usual suspects (among others, the Coalition Against Israel Apartheid, No One is Illegal, and Women in Solidarity With Palestine) and resorting to the usual canards that define their ugly cause, these groups have pledged to derail the campaign in whatever ways they can.

So it looks like the lines have been drawn in an inevitable battle to influence public opinion. There are those in our communal leadership who have long been committed to a quieter, less public approach. This campaign will no doubt come as a great shock to them. But one thing is certain: all eyes will be on Toronto over the next few months – and this is one fight we dare not lose.

Does a 'certain something' set Jews apart?

I learned a new word this summer – "allosemitism." Coined by the Polish-Jewish literary critic Artur Sandauer, it describes a concept I am quite familiar with – the idea of Jews as perpetual "other."

Allosemitism can embrace both positive and negative feelings about Jews – everything, as sociologist Zygmunt Bauman put it, "from love and respect to outright condemnation and genocidal hatred."

At root is the idea that, good or bad, Jews are different from the non-Jewish mainstream and thus unable to be measured by the same yardstick.

The word cropped up during a recent symposium on Jewish and Roma (Gypsy) cultures I attended in Weimar, Germany, as part of a project called, significantly, "The Other Europeans."

Ruth Ellen Gruber in Rome

It was gratifying to find a term that so aptly describes the ambivalent ways that Jews are regarded.

We all know about the historic demonization of Jews. But anti-Semitism can be counterbalanced by an idealization of Jews and Jewish culture that may also be divorced from reality.

The Other Europeans project examines some of these issues by focusing on the relationships between Jewish and Roma cultures, particularly in the realm of music.

The project statement doesn't use the term "allosemitism." Instead, it describes Jews and Roma as having "transcultural" European identities "in both fact and imagination."

This, it states, has led to the condemnation of both groups as "rootless," "parasitic," "degenerate" and worse, as well as to continuing anti-Semitic and anti-Roma outbursts. At the same time, it notes, "the same transcultural character of Yiddish and Roma music is romanticized and embraced by contemporary 'world music' pop culture, which frames it as subversive and transgressive and therefore 'hip.'"

The Other Europeans project is the brainchild of musician Alan Bern, an American who has been based in Berlin since the 1980s. It's sponsored by three Jewish culture festivals – the Weimar Yiddish Summer Weeks, which Bern directs; the annual Festival of Jewish Culture in Krakow, Poland, and the KlezMORE Jewish Music Festival in Vienna.

All three present and teach Jewish music and culture to a predominantly non-Jewish public.

Bern, a key figure in the klezmer music revival over the past two decades, is a thoughtful observer of the sometimes uneasy cultural dynamics between Jews and non-Jews in Europe.

"You define culture through interactions," he once told me. "What defines something is often the point of view from which you regard it."

How to define what is "Jewish" provides endless fodder for debate in post-Holocaust, post-Communist Europe.

Jews are few here now. Jewish communal life, though reviving in some places, is in flux, and Jewish cultural expression is often embraced or even perpetrated by non-Jews.

Strict halachic definition may suffice for the religiously observant. But for Jews and non-Jews alike, that has always told only part of the story. And indeed, as experienced so drastically in the Shoah, definitions of what, or who, is Jewish often come from the outside.

Is there, as the concept of allosemitism implies, a "certain Jewish something" that sets Jews apart?

The Jewish Museum in Munich mounted an exhibit this summer actually called "That Certain Jewish Something." It takes a creative and provocative approach to exploring the intangibles that can imbue objects, and even people, with a sense of Jewishness.

The museum asked the public to bring in an object that had "a certain Jewish something" about it, with an explanation about why they chose the item. More than 120 people, most of them non-Jewish or with distant Jewish roots, did so. All the objects were then displayed, with the stories behind them.

Some of the wide-ranging items are explicitly Jewish: menorahs, kitschy shtetl figurines, silverware marked for meat and dairy, a Ten Commandments paperweight and a comic book called Shaloman.

But for many items – a flashlight, a rock, a tablecloth, a necklace, books, paintings, an ordinary pair of sneakers – "that certain Jewish something" is revealed only by their meaning to the chooser – through what they represent, not what they actually are.

An 11-year-old boy brought in a shirt from the Bayern-Munich soccer team because he read that the team's pre-war president was Jewish. But the sneakers belonged to a Jewish man and are a tangible symbol of his faith: he wears them to shul on Yom Kippur, he wrote, as they are made of cloth, not leather, which is prohibited on the holiday.

A letter to Bob Rae

Dear Mr. Rae,

I recently had the privilege of talking to you during your visit to Jerusalem, as well as hearing your presentation at Hebrew University and reading your Aug. 6 speech before the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations. I can verify that you don't pander to different audiences – your message is consistent. In speaking to Arab groups, you remind them that the Mideast conflict began long before the 1967 war, and that their use of the term "apartheid" is repugnant.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Since we agree on many points, I will focus on those issues where our perspectives – yours as a Liberal leader whose familiarity with Israel exceeds that of many Canadian politicians, and mine as an Israeli academic with some understanding of Canada – clearly diverge.

As a result of your background, you find hope for finding "common ground" in Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations. You refer to this "mediation project" as "one of the greatest ones in the world" and claim "that the parties at their very best are not irretrievably far apart."

Unfortunately, on the ground, many of us do not see the evidence for this, and I fear that once again, a well-intentioned peace effort will end in polarization and even greater violence. I have no doubt that some Palestinians with whom you meet talk about mutual acceptance. I have heard the same words for at least 15 years.

But when Israelis look beyond these private comments and examine Palestinian school books, television programs, and NGO campaigns that promote the Durban strategy, we find the same slogans of rejectionism and violence. There is no evidence of the signs of the "deep consensus" that, in your words, emerges when people come to realize "the sheer cost of continuing a conflict and the obvious benefits of stopping."

On the contrary, the Hamas leadership, which is backed by Iran, has inherited the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's violent legacy, while adding jihadism, a central factor that you did not address. To ignore this reality would be extremely foolish for Israel.

When serious change begins in Palestinian society and in the wider Islamic world, acceptance of Jewish sovereign equality will take at least a generation. Until then, we need to be very cautious. As an academic specializing in international negotiations, I have seen the disastrous results of failed peace plans and warn against such initiatives, including grand plans for shared control of Jerusalem (a misguided project led by former Canadian ambassador Michael Bell).

As an alternative, I spoke to you about conflict management. The late Canadian prime minister Lester Pearson's legacy has led you to dismiss anything less than full peace negotiations as being the province of "Israeli conservatives." This is wrong. We are pragmatists who understand that incremental movement is necessary to avoid failure. We do not, as you say, "ignore how difficult living conditions are for most Palestinians," but we also hear the incitement and the echoes of the terror bombs.

Without roadblocks and security measures, the incidents in which Palestinians are caught with explosives or other weapons would end in many deaths. Israelis have paid dearly for images of idealized peace, and I urge you to give the conflict-management approach serious consideration.

Unfortunately, some of the "positive signs" from NGOs that you were shown are less than positive when understood in detail. You spoke about an event organized by World Vision International (WVI), an NGO that describes itself as "as a Christian relief and development organization," but that also promotes anti-Israel propaganda. On Nov. 29, 2007, WVI's representative in Geneva, Thomas Getman, gave a major speech that UN Watch characterized as seeking "to promote hatred of Israel," and there are numerous additional examples.

The WVI event that you attended was also highly problematic, involving a small Israeli group (Parents' Circle) that participates in a dialogue with Palestinians. Other bereaved Israeli families see this NGO activity as manipulated to promote Palestinian propaganda.

I realize that these distinctions are difficult to see from afar and are inconsistent with optimistic images. But in peacemaking, particularly in our part of the world, it is necessary to move very cautiously. Mediators, like doctors, should be guided by the principle, "First, do no harm."

Respectfully,
Prof. Gerald M. Steinberg

Scandals ruined Ehud Olmert's political career

Ehud Olmert was dead right.

Three months before he announced he would not contest the Kadima party leadership and thereby resign as Israel's prime minister after a new leader is chosen later in September, he told the German newsmagazine Der Spiegel that only a miracle could save his job.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Olmert, whose reputation was first shaken by the inconclusive outcome of the Second Lebanon War, but whose downfall was irrevocably hastened by ongoing police investigations turning on bribery, fraud and breach of trust, finally acknowledged his untenable position on July 30 with his abrupt announcement that he would pull out of Kadima's hotly contested leadership race.

Politically weakened by corruption scandals that sapped his credibility and virtually destroyed his integrity, Olmert, though maintaining his innocence, had no choice but to step down.

Olmert was living on borrowed time. His popularity rating had plummeted to new, unprecedented depths. The defence minister, Ehud Barak, had declared that Olmert could not carry on as usual while enemeshed in scandal. As Barak's Labor party colleague, Shelly Yachimovich, put it, Israelis deserved "a prime minister who is not up to his neck in criminal procedures."

Olmert's squeaky clean rival, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who had called for his resignation in the wake of the 2006 war in Lebanon, was just as blunt, suggesting that the allegations against him went to the heart of the "values and norms" of Israeli society, and that he had no alternative but to draw the appropriate conclusions. Additionally, three parliamentary non-confidence motions in his government hammered home the point that Olmert was in deep trouble.

Prior to these setbacks, he was steadfast and unwavering, determined to tough it out, come what may.

"I have no intention of resigning, and I am not going anywhere," he said in a blustery retort. At another juncture, he said he would resign only if indicted.

These combative statements, however, impressed few of his Knesset colleagues. One of them, the chairman of the National Religious Party, Zvulon Orlev, probably spoke for many of his fellow MKs when he caustically observed, "In a civilized country, [Olmert] would have stepped down a long time ago."

In retrospect, Olmert was tainted by the whiff of scandal even before he officially replaced his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, in May 2006.

In 1997, when he was the mayor of Jerusalem and still a member of the Likud party, he was acquitted of responsibility for election campaign irregularities. And two years later, he was briefly embroiled in an unsavoury case revolving around an Israeli developer who sought to build a hotel in Greece.

The most serious charges against him, though, are connected to the period from 2003 onward when he was a cabinet minister.

It is alleged that he bought a home in Jerusalem for $320,000 less than the $1.6 million market price in exchange for helping a construction company acquire building permits. It is alleged that he attempted to help a friend and campaign financier buy stock in the Bank Leumi. It is alleged that he was involved in a scheme to sell and then rent a private residence in Jerusalem.

At the very least, critics charged, Olmert acted inappropriately.

The two scandals that ultimately sealed his fate broke as Israel prepared to celebrate its 60th anniversary of statehood.

In the Talansky affair, an American Jewish businessman, Morris Talansky, testified that he gave Olmert $150,000 over 15 years. Olmert claims he accepted the funds, never repaid, for campaign purposes. But the police appear to believe that Olmert enriched himself in the process. Whatever the truth, the Talansky affair leaves the strong impression that Olmert was hedonistic and high-living. In a fraudulent billing scandal, Olmert allegedly billed state and charitable agencies for the same flights and used the difference for personal trips and family vacations.

In the past few weeks, police officers assigned to Olmert's file have questioned him on seven different occasions. It remains to be seen whether he will be charged with any crimes, but the scandals have doubtless dealt his political career a fatal blow.

Olmert, Israel's fifth premier in just nine years, was something of an accidental prime minister, having assumed office after Sharon succumbed to a massive stroke.

Though it is true that he renewed his mandate through an election, his centrist Kadima party won only 29 Knesset seats and could not have governed without forming a coalition government, the staple of Israeli politics.

Ehud Olmert

Olmert, who was due to finish his term in 2010, got off to a bad start and never really recovered.

About a month after his inauguration as prime minister, an Israeli corporal, Gilad Schalit, was abducted by Palestinian gunmen who attacked his post near the Gaza Strip (which Israel unilaterally relinquished in the summer of 2005). Olmert enthusiastically supported and promoted Sharon's pullout plan, claiming that a unilateral withdrawal was necessary because Israel had no Palestinian partner with whom to negotiate.

Sharon and Olmert both hoped that Israel's pullout from Gaza would pacify the border region and lead to a unilateral withdrawal from much of the West Bank. But Schalit's abduction, the renewal of Qassam rocket attacks on Israeli towns and kibbutzim adjacent to Gaza and the ascendancy of Hamas forced Olmert to abandon unilateralism and reopen direct talks with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas.

These negotiations, launched last autumn under the sponsorship of the United States, have made little headway, notwithstanding Olmert's optimistic view that Israel and the Palestinians are "closer than ever" to reaching understandings that could serve as a basis for a two-state solution and a peace treaty.

Last month, Abbas rejected an Israeli proposal calling for the transfer of 93 per cent of the West Bank to the Palestinians and mutual territorial exchanges. Olmert, who has said that a two-state solution is necessary to ensure Israel's survival as a Jewish state, made the offer amid disquieting reports that Israel is continuing to build new housing units in the West Bank.

On the face of it, Israel's proposal seems fairly generous, but to the Palestinians, it is unacceptable on two counts. In addition to falling short of the Palestinian consensus for a full Israeli withdrawal, it is contingent on the Palestinian Authority regaining control of Gaza, which was seized by Hamas two years ago and is extremely unlikely to be wrested away from Hamas by Fatah, Abbas' militia.

Olmert was also tarred by the Second Lebanon War. The majority of Israelis initially supported it, but public opinion shifted as Hezbollah bombarded Israel and as Hezbollah fighters effectively fought the Israeli army to a draw.

Harshly criticized by the Winograd Commission for his handling of the war, Olmert managed to hang on to his job. But after the war, he was increasingly unpopular.

Olmert regained some footing after ordering the preemptive bombing of a Syrian nuclear facility last September and restarting peace talks with Syria in May. But after four rounds under Turkey's auspices, the talks have yet to reach the point where the two sides can engage in direct negotiations.

Olmert will thus leave the political stage with a decidedly mixed record, but historians will probably remember him as the prime minister whose career was ruined by a series of scandals.

Chamber of Commerce seeks new members

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two years ago, lawyer David Rubin received a call from his friend, Jacques Shore, who was concerned the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC) was pretty much dormant while bilateral trade between Israel and Canada stood at a modest $900 million.

Shore had heard concerns about the languishing trade relationship from Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker, who had made it his goal to improve economic contacts between the two nations.

"Let's get involved," Rubin recalls Shore saying. "So I got involved."

A couple of weeks ago, the reconstituted CICC held a reception for the organization's boards of governors and directors at the home of businessman Leslie Dan. The event was an opportunity for CICC leaders to network and shmooze, and for chamber organizers to make a pitch to attract even more members.

Rubin, the CICC's president, said the group has been operational for only about six to nine months.

"Prior to that, we were building from scratch. We had nothing but a piece of paper with [ideas] written on it."

As a mark of the CICC's success, today it boasts 27 directors and 46 governors who are familiar figures in the business and Jewish communities. Individuals such as Walter Arbib, David Azrieli, Gil Blutrich, Dan, Art Eggleton, Nathan Jacobson, Monte Kwinter, Sam Belzberg, Donald Carr, Tony Comper, David Cynamon, Saul Feldberg, Murray Koffler, Joe Lebovic, Philip Reichmann, Harry Rosen, Isadore Sharp, Alex Shnaider, Ed Sonshine and Lawrence Tanenbaum grace the organization's letterhead.

Leslie Dan and Jacques Shore

Rubin, a business lawyer, said that despite the impressive roster of business leaders, the CICC continues to solicit new members. The organization has held 25 events in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, and it's planning to expand its reach to both coasts, with events in Halifax and Vancouver on the agenda.

One of the group's successes was a November 2006 conference held in conjunction with the law firm Gowlings that led to two Israeli companies – one of them Exent Technologies – filing preliminary prospectuses as part of applications to be listed on the TSX. Had it not been for the economic downturn, two initial public offerings for the companies likely would have been held and the companies would have joined the exchange, Rubin said.

A recently launched interactive website will bring together potential business partners with the idea of promoting trade between the two countries, which has "huge upside potential," Rubin said.

"We see entrepreneurs across Canada to take advantage of the great opportunities in Israel," he added. "The chamber's sophisticated and advanced website will enable those in Canada and Israel to access and exchange business information and potential transactions."

Ron Yekutiel, the CICC's executive vice-president, said members will get a leg up in creating business opportunities with Israeli firms. They will be listed in the CICC online database, will view business opportunities online, receive referrals from CICC staff and participate in CICC missions to Israel.

The CICC believes it can call on around 2,000 Canadian prospect and 60 potential Israeli members. Yekutiel called on the governors and directors to promote the organization and attract new members.

Baker attended the reception in what he described as his last official act as ambassador. His four-year term has come to an end and he planned to return to Israel.

The reception, he said, marks "the real takeoff of the CICC after months of planning. It is very gratifying."

When he first arrived in Ottawa, he set about determining his priorities. As a lawyer who worked for Israel's Foreign Ministry, he was involved in trade negotiations, among other issues.

Trade, he found, was an important element in developing good bilateral relationships, but it was somewhat lacking between Canada and Israel. Despite the efforts of two or three consulate staffers in Toronto, Canada was too big a country for so few people to cover. At the same time, he saw that Canadians were largely unfamiliar with the Israeli economy and its products. He conceived of reconstituting the chamber of commerce as an independent body to promote business between the two countries.

Such a relationship would benefit both sides, he said.

While he was gratified at the growth of the CICC, there is room for improvement, Baker suggested.

Drills pay off during small fire at Eitz Chaim

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Students and staff were evacuated from Eitz Chaim Schools' Patricia Avenue branch for about an hour-and-a-half last Wednesday after a small electrical fire broke out in the school's basement.

No one was injured, and property loss – estimated by Toronto Fire Services at less than $500 – was contained to a single closet on the lower level, said Elias Levy, the school's executive director.

The closet housed several thermostats that controlled the southern wing's heating and air conditioning systems. The building dates back to the early 1970s, but the wing in question was built more recently, Levy said.

David Eckerman, public information officer for Toronto Fire Services, said a small fire in a pile of papers on the floor of the room was put out with a dry chemical extinguisher.

The papers were the thermostat manuals, which had fallen after catching fire, Levy said.

Following the incident, Levy said, the school called in a representative of the thermostat manufacturer.

"We have not been able to determine an actual cause," Levy said. The low-voltage thermostats, which were destroyed in the fire, were less than a year old, and the wiring was also new, he added. "The indication was that it was caused by a short circuit in one of the thermostats."

Damage estimated at less than $500

Seven vehicles from the department arrived at the school just after 11 a.m., and another crew arrived after a second alarm was called in.

A janitor at the school was the first to notice the fire, and a heat alarm went off within seconds, Levy said.

The branch, attended by boys, has about 290 students from grades 1 to 8. Approximately 35 staff members were in the school at the time.

Students and staff re-entered the school after fire services personnel determined that it was safe, Eckerman said.

Although some of the staff were new and the school had not yet held a fire drill following summer vacation, as it was only the second day of school, the evacuation was completed in less than two minutes, Levy said.

Eitz Chaim holds fire drills several times a year, he told The CJN. "The boys exited in an orderly fashion very quickly," he said. "We consider it a tremendous kiddush HaShem."

Corrections

In the Aug. 28 story "UJA Fed kicks off 2009 campaign with song," the writing credit for the song One Song, One Voice was incorrectly given to Amy Sky. The song was actually written by 12 Tribe Productions. The CJN regrets the error.

In "Dealing with lactose intolerance" (About Nutrition, CJN, Sept. 4), there was some incorrect information. It should have said that "it is best to increase your intake of insoluble fibre" to prevent the pain or attacks associated with diverticulitis. The CJN regrets the error.

Cost to rescue Jews from FSU has quintupled since 1972

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Alina Gerlovin Spaulding, keynote speaker at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Lion of Judah luncheon last week, put a very human, dynamic and sometimes humorous face on the more often anonymous recipients of Jewish communal donations.

"Everything I have in this life, everything I will ever achieve, everything I will ever contribute to another human being is because of you and people like you doing something transformational for someone like me at a critical moment in time," she told some 250 women at Toronto's Four Seasons Hotel.

Almost 800 women in Toronto's Jewish community have a gold Lion of Judah pin, signifying a contribution of at least $5,000 to the annual UJA Federation campaign. There are more than 16,000 Lions of Judah worldwide, said Cathy Belzberg, luncheon co-chair with Susan Maldoff.

Gerlovin Spaulding – the 34-year-old director of communication and admission counsellor for the American Hebrew Academy, a Jewish boarding school in Greensboro, NC – was rescued along with her parents from the former Soviet Union in 1979.

Her father, an Olympic hopeful in skiing in the early 1970s, lost any advantages he had as an athlete following a serious 1974 skiing accident, in which he broke his leg. His family was immediately evicted from its apartment, and necessary surgery was delayed for a year, Gerlovin Spaulding said.

"We lived with my grandparents in a one-room flat with no running water and no heat."

Her father suffered medical complications including hepatitis, and he was not expected to live more than another five years after the surgery.

But within a year or two, Gerlovin Spaulding's mother, then still in her early 20s, heard about an organization "that comes to Russia and rescues Jews."

Although she didn't believe it at first, her mother made contact through "a friend of a friend of a friend" with an American woman "who came to Kharkov in the Ukraine to live in someone's closet and to rescue people like my parents."

The woman told her mother, "I know you're terrified. I need you to know that from here on out, you and I are family.

"In 1979 nearly 50,000 Jews were rescued from the former Soviet Union, among them my mother, my father and myself," said Gerlovin Spaulding.

The Gerlovin family spent time in Austria and then Italy before settling in Passaic, N.J. In all three locations they were supported by UJA dollars.

On arriving in the United States, they were taken to a fully furnished apartment – a gift from the Jewish community for as long as they needed it – by a woman who had "adopted" them.

Among the unfamiliar items in their new kitchen were broccoli, kiwi, grapefruit and breakfast cereal, Gerlovin Spaulding recalls. It was as if her parents – "two engineers figuring out how to make cereal" – had come from another planet, she said.

Her father, at the time, was suffering from a heart condition that had been left untreated so long that no doctor they consulted was willing to operate.

With help from an anonymous donor, he underwent experimental surgery in 1980. The following year, Gerlovin Spaulding's brother was born, and in 1994 he had his bar mitzvah at the Kotel, with both parents in attendance, she said.

Alina Gerlovin Spaulding

More recently, following her move to Greensboro, Gerlovin Spaulding went to Moldova to run a Jewish summer family camp sponsored by the Greensboro Jewish community.

After the trip, she and her husband took in two teenage sisters from the Moldovan Jewish community and enrolled them at her school, at the request of their parents, to give them a better future.

Lisa Draper, women's campaign and advocacy chair, noted that the cost to rescue a family from the former Soviet Union and bring them to Israel was $5,000 36 years ago. Today, it costs $25,000 to bring a family from war-torn Georgia, she said.

Two weeks after this year's campaign launch, Women's Campaign and Advocacy had already raised more than $2.5 million, Draper said. She asked those present to consider increasing their gifts by 10 per cent.

Henry Wolfond, co-chair with Fran Sonshine of the federation's 2009 campaign, spoke of the influence of his mother and his wife, both Lions of Judah, in their support of worthy causes.

"We must understand that it's not just what we learn from our parents, it's what we teach our children and grandchildren," he said.

ACROSS THE STREET ACROSS THE GLOBE

From Greater Toronto to the world beyond Toronto, UJA Federation is transforming lives every day in every way, everywhere there are urgent Jewish needs.

Together, with your help, we stand with the people of Israel by funding educational and social services provided by UIA Federations Canada to vulnerable individuals and vulnerable communities.

Within the first 72 hours after this summer's conflict began in Georgia on August 8, The Jewish Agency for Israel, supported by the North American Jewish Federation network, evacuated more than 200 Jews under fire, processed aliyah applications and placed new olim on planes to Israel.

In our own community, UJA Federation is helping to break the cycle of poverty for the working poor; creating opportunities for all our children to enjoy Jewish summer camp and the warm, lifelong memories and strengthened Jewish identity that follow; bringing young adults and community newcomers closer to Jewish life and creating a Jewish comfort zone in the turbulent world of university and college campuses.

UJA's work is bound by its responsibility for each other as one people, strengthened by centuries of values and anchored by the community's incomparable commitment.

UJA Federation is here to transform lives and create a better world. Across the street. Across the globe.

Georgian family starts new life in Israel

On August 12th, 2008 Vazha and Irina Mamisashvili and their two young sons Nikoloz, 8, and David, 5, were airlifted to Israel during the height of the war in Georgia. They arrived at Ben Gurion airport emotionally and physically drained, but with incredible hope for the future. They were home.

Two weeks later, the Mamisashvili family is living on Kibbutz Masada, in the Jordan Valley. They are part of the Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) First Home in the Homeland program, in which new immigrant families are directly absorbed by Kibbutzim around the country.

JAFI is supported by Jewish Federations across North America.

"Israel is our first home," says Vazha with pride. "Georgia is our second home."

The Mamisashvili's were living with Vazha's family on the outskirts of Tbilisi when the war broke out. Their area was bombed; a missile made an almost direct hit on their building. Vazha decided not to wait a minute longer to take his family to Israel. With the assistance of a JAFI emissary, they were on their way to Israel only a few days later.

After being met at the airport by a Kibbutz volunteer, they were taken to their new home - a three room Kibbutz bungalow that was already equipped with living and bedroom furniture, kitchen appliances, a television, and most importantly in the stifling hot weather of the Jordan valley, an air conditioner.

Vazha (right) and Irina Mamisashvili (2nd from left) seen here with their sons Nikoloz, 8 and David, 5, were airlifted to Israel during the height of the war in Georgia. They are joined by friend, Lusha Stav (centre), a recent immigrant to Israel from her native Russia.

"Everyone has been so kind and helpful," says Vazha. "We have been given so much. More than the physical assistance, we have someone from the Kibbutz, Lusha, who is helping us to adjust here in Israel in every aspect of our lives."

The family, like all new olim, is already receiving the variety of services they are entitled to from the State of Israel, including a monthly stipend to help them in their first year in their new home.

"The personal care that the new immigrants receive from the First Home in the Homeland program is exceptional," says JAFI's Shai Shoshani. "The Kibbutz volunteers make the new immigrants feel at home and bring them into Kibbutz life and into Israeli society in a natural way."

Vazha, an engineer and small business entrepreneur, is very emotional about the support they have received, especially from the Jewish Agency.

"The emissary in Tbilisi, Grisha Brodsky, is a great man," says Vazha. "He puts his heart and soul into helping the Georgian Jewish community. I saw all the support the Jewish Agency gives to people in Tbilisi and in Israel. They help all the time."

Student finds a home away from home at Hillel

York University student David Gordon makes a new friend while on a Hillel mission to Uganda.

The excitement and anticipation that many Jewish university students feel during their return to our nation's campuses is, unfortunately, often overshadowed by anti-Israeli sentiment that exists on many of those institutions.

Many of our students feel isolated and not truly connected to campus life.

David Gordon, a student at York University was one of these students. That is, before he passed through the doors of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Confronted with the same issues facing Jewish students across North America, Gordon needed to understand how he could form a proper sense of self while nurturing his Jewish identity on a campus that is often politically turbulent.

For Gordon, Hillel of Greater Toronto, supported by UJA Federation, offered him the opportunity to cultivate new relationships, and delve more deeply into his Jewish roots while giving him the confidence he needed to feel secure with his beliefs in a sometimes intimidating environment.

Essentially, it provided Gordon with a home away from home.

"One day I walked up to Hillel and they welcomed me with open arms," he explained. "Ever since then, I formed a connection with, and passion for Jewish life and for the State of Israel."

More than just connecting locally with other students in Toronto, Gordon was able to translate his Hillel experience into something more global. He was now able to travel to different places and extend himself beyond what he thought possible, in a very Jewish way, strengthening his commitment and identity.

"I was able to participate on two trips through Hillel," he said, eyes warming at the memories. "One was to New Orleans and the other to Uganda where we helped build a school in a vulnerable village. Seeing the smiling faces of the kids that we were helping, created this greater sense of a Jewish identity because here I was learning about my values of tzedakah and tikun olam – repairing the world - and learning about how not only Jews help each other, but that we also help the world."

The lessons of Yizkor

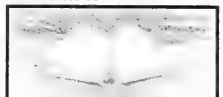
By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Allan Tobin, a UCLA biologist, has written that we have enormous memories. An educated person may have a working vocabulary of 100,000 to 200,000 words. That is equivalent to several megabytes of memory. Each person also has describable memories of episodes that extend to childhood and usually indescribable memories of skills and procedures (such as ice skating or bicycle riding) learned long ago.



But what about past episodes that we don't recall? Are these gone forever, or have we filed them away somewhere in the recesses of our cerebral cortexes?

Memories remain, the neuroscientists tell us, even when they are, for a time, inaccessible. An amazing illustration comes from the testimony of a neurosurgeon who stimulated his patient's open brain during an operation. With each stimulation of a certain spot, the patient later reported he vividly heard a melody that he had not encountered since childhood. This way of evoking memories through electrical stimulation is powerful evidence that usually inaccessible memories remain in our brains.

Free association of words and images – the province of the psychoanalyst – Tobin notes, also may trigger memories that we didn't know were present. Have we not all encountered this phenomenon? We hear a melody or view a photograph and are suddenly struck by a memory we haven't recalled in many years.

A prominent biologist has waggishly suggested that the real function of the brain is not to remember but to forget. While this may sound foolish at first, it's actually quite reasonable: in order to avoid perceiving the world as complete chaos, we need to "forget" data that don't fit the pattern.

And what constitutes the pattern? More often than not, we try to remember what we have been in order to focus on how we currently see ourselves and what we hope to become in the future.

Thus, we Jews, in order to direct our memories, recite the Yizkor prayers. We will recite them twice in the coming weeks, on Yom Kippur and Shmini Atzeret. Through these prayers, we remember departed family members, friends and our other Jewish brethren. Through these prayers, we distinguish ourselves from the free associations of psychotherapy or artistic creation.

Take, for instance, the Italian painter Franco Magnani. Magnani compulsively concentrated his prodigious memory and artistic abilities on a single subject – his boyhood village in Tuscany – which he painted and repainted in photographic detail, just as it was before the German occupation. The Yizkor prayers allow us to avoid such obsessiveness, so that we may better appreciate our own, more controllable memories.

On the other hand, the Yizkor prayers also don't permit us to neglect our memories. Even these controllable memories evoke emotions – sadness, pain, smiles and affection. This is as it should be. We need to reflect upon our distinctiveness as we consider the words of the elderly woman who told her son that the nice thing about having Alzheimer's disease is that you meet so many nice new people every day.

It appears that the lesson of Yizkor concerning memory is particularly relevant to this period of time. We are now observing the seventh anniversary of the horrific attacks on the World Trade Center in New York on Sept. 11, 2001. There are those who would recall every detail of that day, every minute of those terrible events. And there are those who, for whatever reason, would prefer not to think about the events of that day and, like the lady above, start the next day without any connection to the one before.

Neither of these approaches represent proper means of memorializing the events and victims of 9/11. The Yizkor prayers teach us to recall, to feel and to take these memories and feelings with us into the next day.

A time to rediscover enchantment

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Many Jews today – religious and less traditional, male and female, in Israel and the Diaspora, affluent and of humble means – feel that, somehow, something does not quite add up spiritually in their lives.

Judaism, which should be nurturing and sustaining, doesn't leave us with a sensation of being filled up, of being inspired and elevated.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Social historians like to say that everyone is "situated" in a given place and time, and thus in a given historical context. When one looks today at where we are situated, certain inescapable facts loom large. The first is that we are so immersed in the modern world and have unwittingly absorbed so many of its presuppositions – from the autonomy of choice to the diversity of truth – that we often don't stand back and think about what effect this has on our ability to live a sacred life.

In 1918, the sociologist Max Weber, in an essay titled "Science as a Vocation," wrote the sentence that has become the defining credo of our age: "The fate of our times is characterized by rationalization and intellectualization and above all, by the disenchantment of the world." Weber defines "disenchantment" as "the knowledge or belief that... there are no mysterious incalculable forces that come into play, but rather that one can, in principle, master all things by calculation."

Jews who maintain tradition sometimes might feel that they don't share Weber's view – that, after all, we are believers in God and the bearers of a religious heritage.

But when Weber terms the modern condition as one of "disenchantment," this does not simply mean that many people don't believe in God or that organized religion no longer plays a central role in the culture, or that we live in "a secular age," to borrow some well-worn phrases. Rather, the language of disenchantment reaches far and wide, and it's something that nearly everyone expresses, consciously or unwittingly, regardless of religious affiliation or professed faith.

Our language regularly betrays us; we say that person X is out of touch with the world, or that that person Y has a mindset from the Middle Ages, and so forth.

The philosopher Charles Taylor, in a telling phrase, argues that what contemporary people have created is "a buffered self," not open and porous and vulnerable to the world of the spirits and higher powers, but bounded up and guarded against such foolish notions as demons and fairies.

Even in an ostensibly religious context, we are buffered against the idea that God is truly involved in our lives and plays a direct role in nature and society, not to mention whether I am going to get a promotion at work and if my grandmother will recover from her surgery.

We still do the actions that bespeak an observant lifestyle, but somewhere deep inside, for many Jews, the taken-for-granted feeling that God is utterly in charge of life – my life as well as that of kings and queens – has given way to a more prudent assessment of what, so to speak, is God's domain and what is ours.

This is the real challenge of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur: to work through our own disenchantments and find a way back to the roots of faith.

Jewish Life

An evaluation of interfaith relations

The Changing Christian World: A Brief Introduction for Jews* by Rabbi Leonard A. Schoolman, Jewish Lights Publishing.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1965, Pope John XXIII convened the Second Vatican Council. This meeting of bishops from all over the Catholic world marked a sea change for the Church. What resulted was a landmark declaration, known as Nostra Aetate (In Our Time), calling for respect among all religions.

The document enunciated the principle that the Jewish biblical covenant with God was still valid and had not been superseded by the Christian New Covenant. The centuries-old denigration of Jews and contempt for Judaism as a fossil religion came to an end. In effect, Jews became honoured older brothers and sisters. Jews were no longer viewed mainly as candidates for conversion. Before long, almost every Protestant denomination followed suit with similar declarations or pronouncements.

Rabbi Leonard Schoolman, the author of this brief and enlightening volume, served for 18 years as director of programs for the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, for 10 years as a pulpit rabbi and for the past 12 years, as a devoted worker in the field of interfaith relations.

The Changing Christian World: A Brief Introduction for Jews is divided into two segments. The first portion is concerned with such theological questions as original sin; how Jews should regard Jesus; resurrection; and immortality.

The second portion deals with issues confronting Jews: conversion efforts aimed at them; what to believe about the Messiah; the inerrancy or literal truth of the Bible; Israel and Christian Zionism; and the political efforts of the radical right in the United State.

Rabbi Schoolman indicates that to a very large extent, being saved or salvation is the essential message of Christianity. This is the heart of where Christianity differs from Judaism. If people are inherently sinful, then Jesus' role as Saviour becomes crucial. If instead, as Judaism teaches, people are not inherently sinful but are essentially a combination of good and bad (and the role of religion is to help them affirm the good), then Jesus' salvific powers become unnecessary.

Where the Bible is concerned, the author believes that it must be regarded as a revered document of religious truth but not as a science textbook. He writes, "Thus Jews have been largely absent from the raucous debate about Charles Darwin and evolution, which seems to convulse fundamentalist Christian theology."

Looking optimistically to the future, the author makes some calculated guesses:

- While there may still be some pronouncements from the Southern Baptists and a few other Protestant groups about converting the Jews, most of these efforts seem destined to be extremely limited in their effect.
- The various crises in the Roman Catholic Church (sexual abuse and shortage of clergy among others) may allow some of the more liberal voices in the American Church to be heard with more effect. Catholics and Jews will continue to work together in substantial ways.
- Jews don't have too much to worry about in relation to Christian anti-Semitism, at least on an institutional or systemic level. Except for a hard-core lunatic fringe, anti-Semitism as a social force is largely dead in the United States.

Is this book overoptimistic in its evaluation of interfaith relations? Perhaps. But there is no question that it is lucid, provocative, informative and helpful.

Back to school at iTunes U

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The days are getting shorter, the holidays are approaching and the kids are back in school. Now is the perfect time for you to return to university, too – and it won't cost you a penny. You can do it through iTunes U.

ITunes U is an incredible assortment of audio and video files that can be enjoyed for free. ITunes is the free Apple software best known as the program used to download music onto iPods. Recently, a number of universities and other cultural institutions have begun to take advantage of this technology to distribute recordings of university courses and lectures to their student body and to the general public.

If you'd like to "attend" iTunes U, first you'll need to download iTunes. It's available for both Macs and PCs – and it's free. [apple.com/itunes/download] Then you can visit the iTunes U section and start browsing through the hundreds of lectures. [tinyurl.com/2ha9ae] You can listen – and sometimes view – all of these lectures right on your computer and do not need to own an iPod. However, an iPod is handy if you'd like to listen on the go.

In 2006, John Mearsheimer, a political scientist of the University of Chicago, and Stephen Walt, of the Harvard Kennedy School of Government, wrote a controversial article in the London Review of Books and then a book in which they described the power of the Israel lobby and criticized what they called unconditional support of Israel by the United States. The article provoked accusations of anti-Semitism and a series of passionate counter-arguments and rebuttals. [tinyurl.com/nytlobby] Last year, Mearsheimer and Walt delivered a two-hour lecture based on their writings at Princeton University – followed by remarks by Princeton's Robert Keohane who called the book a much-needed contribution to the debate on U.S. foreign policy but also "a very flawed work of political science." [tinyurl.com/isrlobby] (video)

As consumers and manufacturers look for new ways to reduce the environmental impact we are having on the world, Shai Agassi has a fascinating dream. The Technion graduate and entrepreneur wants to convert Israel to an-electric fleet of vehicles. It's interesting to note that back in 2006 when he gave this lecture at Stanford, Agassi was unemployed. Since then, he founded the company Better Place, has gained interest of the Israeli government, raised $200 million toward the project and has just appeared on the cover of Wired magazine. [tinyurl.com/agassicar] You can listen to Agassi describe why his is "Not Just a Pipe Dream." [tinyurl.com/electisr]

The Jewish community in Germany is the fastest growing Jewish community in the world. And it also sparks questions among people who thought for decades that such a phenomenon would never happen. Jeffrey Peck, a professor of communication, at Georgetown University, has studied "Being Jewish in the New Germany." But rather than just focusing on the past, Peck is interested in the friction that is occurring in Germany today between members of the country's traditional Jewish community and immigrants from the former Soviet Union, who consider themselves Jewish but do not fulfil the halachic requirements. From this mix, Peck sees the evolution of a new German-Jewish identity that is "more eastern European, more Russian, more European, perhaps more cosmopolitan" than the postwar community that has lived there. This is a fascinating lecture. [tinyurl.com/newgermany] (video)

New York's 92nd Street Y is known for the outstanding calibre of it arts programming and guest lecturers. Even if you don't live in the neighbourhood, you don't have to miss out because I was thrilled to see that the Y has created a massive minisite at iTunes U featuring a wide variety of speakers, including the Jerusalem Post's Caroline Glick ("Israel and the Global Jihad"); global financier George Soros; author and neurologist Dr. Oliver Sachs; and from 1993, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter.[tinyurl. com/92ndsty]

The site also shines with entertainment luminaries such as Carl Reiner, Sydney Pollack, Richard Dreyfuss and Barbara Walters. But what I particularly like are the Y's eclectic topics, and you can't get much more eclectic than "Deadwood – Jews and the Old West." If you have 90 minutes to spare, mosey on down to iTunes U and learn about a fascinating corner of Jewish history, pardner. [tinyurl. com/deadwood92y]

Kashrut agencies shouldn't be leveraging ethics

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Guest Voice

I would like to provide some nuance to the three CJN columnists – Jean Gerber, Daniel Held and Yoni Goldstein – who have recently addressed the need for ethical considerations in kashrut supervision.

To summarize the issue briefly: Agriprocessors, the largest producer of kosher meat in North America, was raided in May by U.S. immigration officials, and close to 400 workers were arrested, jailed and charged with immigration violations. It was the largest immigration raid in U.S. history. In addition to employing illegal immigrants, the Postville, Iowa-based company was alleged to have violated various labour laws in its treatment of its workers.

In the aftermath of the raid, the Orthodox Union, the OU, was questioned as to how it could provide kosher supervision to a company that violated basic ethical standards in the treatment of its workers. Calls were made to form a kashrut supervisory agency that would only give hechshers to companies that also passed certain ethical standards.

I agree with these sentiments, but disagree with the proposals.

For one thing, the OU and every other supervising agency have protocols for dealing with non-kashrut-related issues. If Agriprocessors is found to have been aware of the illegal immigrants and to have violated labour laws, then the OU ought to use its protocols to determine the conditions of its kosher supervision.

Rabbi Tradburks

Secondly, there are mitzvot that govern the ethical behaviour of workers, as well as the behaviour of employers toward workers. There are also mitzvot that govern personal ethical behaviour. We should all be honest. We should pay our taxes honestly. We should maintain the laws of our country. We shouldn't hire nannies or housekeepers who are illegal immigrants. We should not pay for things in cash when we know the vendor wants to avoid taxes. We should be polite, kind, generous, pleasant and honest.

That's a pretty big job, but it's our personal obligation.

The issues concerning Agriprocessors are not personal. They involve the question of how we can use our economic leverage to bring about changes in big business – and specifically, how can a kashrut supervisory agency use its leverage to ensure that a company's practices are kosher before stamping its food as kosher?

In other words, we are asking the OU to use its leverage – its muscle – to achieve a broader good.

The sentiment is fine – to predicate kosher supervision on kosher business practices. However, the process is inherently flawed, dangerous and, to my mind, to be avoided in the extreme.

Let's examine this idea. Why not use kashrut supervision to leverage compliance with other mitzvot? After all, ethical treatment of workers is not the only mitzvah in the Torah. Why use leverage only for that particular mitzvah?

What other mitzvot of the Torah are important? How about Shabbat? Let's say a family wants to have supervised kosher bat mitzvah lunch on Shabbat. The hosts are not observant of Shabbat and gather the family for pictures at lunch. Should the Kashruth Council of Canada (which oversees the COR hechsher) state in its contract not only that the food should be kosher, but that Shabbat must be observed by the hosts?

And what about the entertainment? What if there are scantily clad female dancers? This is sexist and demeaning to women. Should the Kashruth Council state in its contract that the entertainment must also be "kosher"? It could thereby leverage its service to avoid having women being demeaned.

Take gambling. Perhaps the Kashruth Council should not give supervision to a bar mitzvah event where the theme is gambling, thus leveraging its service to avoid guests developing a possible life-ruining addiction.

It doesn't make sense to pick only one mitzvah out of so many and predicate the kosher supervision of the food on ethical business practices alone.

I personally don't want the Kashruth Council using its leverage as a tool to dictate to me the type of event I want. If we want it to use its leverage to achieve better working conditions, why stop there? Workers' rights are not the only mitzvah in the Torah. Maybe we should use our leverage to deal with other weighty issues – such as Shabbat, the treatment of women and gambling.

I think the notion of using leverage to force companies to treat workers fairly is not prudent and will create an inappropriate use of coercion in other areas as well. By the way, these are not simply theoretical possibilities. These have all been discussed by the Kashruth Council, which has taken the principled position that it will not dictate behaviours, but rather will only supervise kashrut.

Jewish Life

Why has the issue of ethics become the responsibility of the OU alone?

My other objection is in the area of leverage in general. Why has the issue of ethics become the responsibility of the OU alone, and why has it been linked to its supervision of one company? We as consumers have every right to use our own economic leverage. If we care about the ethical treatment of employees, we ought to demand that our shuls ascertain that the cleaning companies they employ hire only legal immigrants and that the cleaners work reasonable hours. And we should demand the same of our shul caterers and office suppliers, and so on.

And perhaps we shouldn't shop at Wal-Mart, since it blocks unions. And maybe we shouldn't have watched the Olympics and supported a regime that is totalitarian and restricts freedoms. Or perhaps we shouldn't buy items made in China, or products made by Coca-Cola, a sponsor of the Olympics. And perhaps we should require these embargoes of our shuls and schools as well.

So, let me summarize:

• I believe in ethics – we should all act personally with the highest of ethical behaviour.

• I believe that the use of leverage by kashrut agencies is a bad idea. Leveraging one mitzvah – ethics – invites leveraging in other areas. Let kashrut agencies supervise kashrut, and kashrut alone.

• Let's be consistent with how we use our economic leverage. While kashrut agencies should avoid using leverage, we as consumers ought to use our own leverage. We should be consistent in avoiding businesses that employ illegal immigrants, that treat workers unfairly, that block unions (if we feel that doing so hurts workers) and that support totalitarian regimes.

I agree with Yoni Goldstein's conclusion: let's seize the awareness of ethics that the Agriprocessors case has brought to our attention. Ethical behaviour is a lifelong pursuit that needs constant reinforcement. Rather than pointing the finger at the OU to do our ethical posturing for us, we ought to take personal responsibility to increase our personal ethical behaviour. Let the OU supervise the kashrut of the food, and let the OU respond appropriately if illegal activities are discovered in the companies it supervises. And let's personally take the initiative in using economic leverage at the grassroots level as a way to effect changes in big business and totalitarian regimes.

Leo Baeck gets interim director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Leo Baeck Day School has hired an interim director to lead the school for the coming year, following the resignation of David Prashker in March.

Dennis (Denny) Grubbs arrived in Toronto last month from New Hampshire, where he has lived since his retirement in 1999. A longtime school administrator who grew up in Hartford, Conn., Grubbs, 66, headed two schools in Massachusetts, consecutively from 1975 to 1984 and from 1984 to 1999.

Dennis (Denny) Grubbs

Following his retirement – and his realization that he didn't like the lifestyle – he has served as interim head of school at six American schools, most recently the Day School at Baltimore Hebrew, which, like Leo Baeck, is a Reform Jewish day school.

Prashker's resignation from Leo Baeck, amid a controversy over content in poetry that he had posted online, took effect Aug. 31, but he has been on paid leave of absence since the spring.

Grubbs has noted "very little" fallout in the wake of Prashker's resignation, adding that there was no impact on enrolment. He said the student population has increased from about 800 students to a total of 815 at the school's two campuses.

His role, as he sees it, is "to help the school make the transition from one permanent head to the next as seamlessly as possible… It gives the board of trustees time to do the permanent director search in a serious and focused way."

A secondary role for an interim head of school is "almost a live-in consultant," Grubbs said. "You have the ability to be diagnostic about strengths and weaknesses, to suggest change, and to try and figure out what change you can bring."

He plans to be "supportive rather than diagnostic" regarding the school's involvement in the International Baccalaureate program.

Leo Baeck was accepted as a prospective member of the prestigious International Baccalaureate Organization in 2006, for its middle years program. The organization works with schools to improve their curricula and teaching methods, and it aims to help students become critical thinkers who care about local and world issues.

"It's a strong commitment, and we are moving as rapidly as possible toward being a permanent International Baccalaureate school," Grubbs said.

Brian Simon, president of Leo Baeck's board, notified parents in an Aug. 12 e-mail that Grubbs would begin the following week. The interim director's experience and recommendations are "stellar," Simon wrote.

His role is "very important for the stability of the school," Simon told The CJN.

When the search was in progress, Simon recalled, a search committee member attended the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) conference, and Grubbs' name kept coming up as a potential candidate.

Grubbs said that working at a Jewish school is different than working at a public one, but "less than people think, because all schools have their version of good intentions, which they describe as their mission. The function of administration is to empower that mission, whatever it is.

"I find the mixture of serious educational process, serious religious involvement and social purpose – making children into the beginnings of the good citizens of the world they're going to be – just a great thing to be part of."

Grubbs said he missed having a sense of purpose after he retired. "I need to feel that what I'm doing every day has a positive purpose and makes a real difference.

"I get really excited by what other people see as problems. I like solving problems. I love the ability to empower other administrators. I really like the idea of involving a lot of people in the process and getting a community to a better place, and I like waking up in the morning and thinking I'm going off to school.

"And if I get at all down, there are always kids full of that wonderful ebullience. I love being surrounded by that."

A self-described "sports nut" and grandfather of six whose wife "tolerates" his post-retirement career, Grubbs likens "interim heading" to grandparenting.

As an interim head, he said, "You come into town, you love the place, you can be directive toward it, and then you turn it over to somebody else and you go home."

Torontonian helps launch Bible project in Ukraine

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

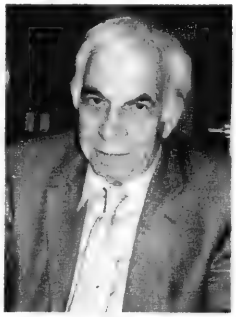
"People of the World Inscribe the Bible" – an international project that had its Canadian debut in February 2007 with the participation of Prime Minister Stephen Harper – was launched in Ukraine last Thursday with help from Toronto businessman Nathan Jacobson.

In the past two years, Amos Rolnik, a septuagenarian Israeli former adman and publisher, has taken the project to 54 countries.

He came up with the idea of a Bible-related project in 1997 as a way of conveying "the message of Israel to the world."

The project, which is under the auspices of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and which includes the New Testament, involves each individual participant writing a Bible verse in his or her own handwriting, and in his or her own language.

There is one book for each country – Rolnik cited Tamil, Mandarin, Czech, Italian, Polish and Finnish versions in an interview at the Consulate General of Israel during a brief visit to Toronto.



Amos Rolnik

An Arabic version, launched in Egypt, is particularly important to Rolnik, he said. "I'd like to show that the Bible and peace go together."

The books will not be published, but will be stored in a yet-to-be-built "Bible House" in Jerusalem.

Jacobson – a native of Winnipeg who has Ukrainian Jewish roots and business interests in Ukraine – told The CJN before he left for the Kiev launch that he wants every Jew in Ukraine to have an opportunity to write a sentence from the Torah. "I look at it as a way to remind them they're not forgotten, and to keep them close to the religion," he said.

In addition to underwriting the project in Ukraine, Jacobson bought an RV in order to travel "to every shtetl… [so that] no Jew will be missed."

Among Jacobson's previous involvements in Ukraine, he helped found a Jewish orphanage in Kiev. He said the Jewish population in the country numbers at least 200,000.

The project ran into a snag when Rolnik learned that there was no Ukrainian-language version of the Bible.

"I said, 'It's impossible. The Bible has already been translated into 2,035 languages,'" he recalled. But, he said, it turned out that – because of the former Soviet regime – that was indeed the case.

Just two weeks ago, however, nine Ukrainian translators who had made aliyah were engaged to translate an initial 300 Bible verses so that the launch could take place as planned Sept. 4 at Kiev's Brodsky Synagogue, and the project could begin.

Rolnik said he hopes the entire translation will be complete "within a year."

"People of the World Inscribe the Bible" follows Rolnik's initial effort, the publication of a book called Children of the World Illustrate the Bible.

Submissions were culled from 800,000 drawings by children in 91 countries, Rolnik said.

To this day, he can't say why he came up with the Bible as the focus for the project. Growing up on a left-wing kibbutz with socialist parents, it wasn't a likely choice.

But these days, Rolnik sports an iPod just so he can listen to the Bible. Once he started to familiarize himself with the ancient text six years ago, he "fell in love" with it, he said.

Nathan Jacobson, right, was also involved in a Torah-writing project in Kiev last week.

Following the publication of the book, Rolnik founded Bible Valley (biblevalley.org), an interfaith organization whose ultimate goal is creating a 25,000-acre biblical village in Israel, with "everything as it was 3,000 years ago." It took four years just to finish the master plan, he said.

The project is planned for Emek Ha'ela, just south of Jerusalem, "where David fought against Goliath."

Blogging rabbis reach out to the world

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

As the rabbi of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Cote St. Luc, Quebec, 46-year-old Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz not only gives sermons from the bimah, he has also found a way to offer words of wisdom through a virtual pulpit, by blogging.

Rabbi Debra Landsberg

A blog (short for "web log") is a regularly updated journal on the Internet where people are invited to comment on entries. Rabbi Steinmetz is one of only a dozen rabbis in North America who have or operate a blog, a handful of them in Canada.

He refers to this ever-growing Internet tool as "the ultimate megaphone." By opening this digital door, the rabbi has invited people all over the world into his shul, and into his head.

One of the many advantages he cites for having a blog is that his speeches can reach beyond the synagogue bulletin and the Montreal Jewish community.

"In this way, anyone anywhere can see something of interest to them," he says. "A rabbi gets up on Shabbat, presumably because he has something to say, and on a blog, hopefully a lot more people can take a look at it."

His blog, like most, includes archives of previous postings. Recent postings include an array of topics, such as how brand names are "junk food for the soul" that contribute to spiritual emptiness, and Jewish parents who pressure their children to achieve.

Part of what he says brought him to blogging five years ago was the opportunity to connect with a wide group of people of all religious spectrums, both Jewish and non-Jewish, although he is Orthodox.

"It's something that could have a wide audience. It's really just to connect with people and to share Shabbat morning sermons and basic Jewish wisdom for a good life," he says.

His blog gets some 250 visitors a week, and that number is climbing.

He receives e-mail and visitors from North America, Europe, Australia, Kuwait, China and the United Kingdom.

"The web is an amazing way to connect, not just with congregants, but with the entire world," he says.

Citing his congregants as his greatest source of inspiration and criticism, he says they often approach him with observations and commentary of their own. They inquire about his choice of subject, or suggest topics.

"This is co-authorship. People feel like they're partners with you," he says. "I think blogging is in some ways more approachable than a website or a sermon. It certainly offers people an opportunity to come back with comments."

Rabbi Debra Landsberg, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto, expresses the same sentiment about her own two-year-old blog.

"I wanted to engage in conversation, albeit virtually, with my congregation about the Jewish universe – its vitality and diversity and challenges. I have been humbled by how this tool has served to build relationships with congregants I do not see face-to-face as often as I may like," she says.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

"As I thought about what needed to be said at the holy days, I knew there was much I couldn't share with a congregation in a sanctuary setting. I was hungry for a more intimate mode of communication in which I could connect over thoughts both large and small."

CBC report casts critical eye on Hamas in Gaza

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

One of the most common and valid concerns about media coverage of the Arab-Israeli conflict is that because Israel is a free, democratic country, it has become a victim of its own openness.

Journalists are frequently critical of Israel because they are allowed to be. But in the surrounding Palestinian areas and autocratic Arab states, the media are tightly controlled by the ruling regimes. In the face of restrictions and intimidation, reporters tend to self-censor their work.

There have been exceptions, but they are rare. More typical is what happened when, on the evening of 9/11, the Fatah-controlled Palestinian Authority confiscated film taken of many Palestinians celebrating the collapse of the twin towers and threatened the lives of anyone (including a Palestinian cameraman employed by Associated Press) who dared to show the film.

When Hamas violently took control of Gaza in June 2007, it raised the level of intimidation, harassing foreign correspondents and Palestinian journalists working for western news agencies.

Add to this the contingent of journalists (more often European than North American) who identify with the "underdog" Palestinians. These reporters blame Israel for all the failings of Palestinian governance, or turn their attention away entirely. Accordingly, a double standard of coverage has all too often become the norm.

But recent developments have shaken up the standard storyline, challenging the accepted way of viewing the conflict. Hamas' brutal takeover of Gaza forced many journalists to confront the reality that harsh, violent and repressive measures exacted on Palestinians by other Palestinians could not simply be attributed to the "occupation," especially since Israel unilaterally ended its control of Gaza in the summer of 2005.

On CBC News Sunday (Sept. 1) Terry Milewski took a rare, in-depth look at the situation inside Gaza. In a piece later adapted for CBC.ca, Milewski looked at Hamas' violent repression of the clans affiliated with rival faction Fatah. He also revealed a growing disapproval of Hamas by ordinary Gazans.

In "Islamic state? Not yet" on CBC.ca, Milewski quoted a Gaza woman as saying: "We live in a prison. If we want to criticize, it's forbidden."

Milewski wrote: "But she throws caution to the winds, her voice rising as she condemns the Hamas crackdown on its rivals in Fatah. 'It's our neighbours who are oppressing us.'"

Another woman promised that Gaza's youth will grow up to exact "revenge" against Hamas.

Milewski commented: "Considering the neighbourhood is full of Hamas gunmen, it's a gutsy statement. But she's not alone in voicing opposition…

"Even more striking is that people dare to speak openly of something that is heresy to Hamas – peace with Israel. Most adult Gazans can remember when it was possible to make a living by working in construction or agricultural jobs in Israel. No more."

Milewski interviewed Mahmoud Zahar, co-founder of Hamas, a man rigidly committed to the extinction of Israel.

Milewski remarked: "Mahmoud Zahar isn't going to evolve… And he is unmoved by the world's rejection."

Zahar expects the international community to change its position: "'Believe me, nothing is eternal. There will be a big change in the American administration, the [diplomatic] Quartet [of Russia, the European Union, the United States and the United Nation], even Israel.'"

Milewski concluded: "This, in a nutshell, is Gaza's problem. Instead of adapting to its environment, Hamas expects the environment to change. As long as Hamas threatens to destroy Israel, Gaza remains isolated and wretched. Many Gazans will blame Hamas as well as Israel."

Critical reporting about Israel is to be expected, as long as it's fair and accurate. Rarely has the same standard been applied to the Palestinian leadership. For at least doing so in the case of Gaza, the CBC deserves to be commended.

You can read Milewski's report at: http://www.cbc.ca/world/story/2008/09/01/rfa-milewski.html.

Windsor shuls host 'homecoming' gala

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

If Rabbi Jeffrey Ableser has his way, Windsor, Ont.'s Jewish population will swell this Rosh Hashanah.

The city's two main shuls, Rabbi Ableser's Reform Congregation Beth El and the Orthodox Shaar Hashomayim Congregation, will host a Jewish New Year Gala and Special Homecoming Reunion for Windsor Jews and Jews who've left the city over the years for points west and east.

"It's a great community, but I've seen it dwindle, and most of our kids have gone to Toronto," Rabbi Ableser told The CJN.

Rabbi Ableser estimates the current Jewish population in Windsor at around 1,500 and said he wants people to remember that his community has been around since the late 1700s.

"I tend to know just about every Jew in this city," he said, adding that he hopes the gala will attract Jews from Toronto and Detroit back to the city to help shore up its flagging Jewish population and make use of its excess community infrastructure.

Rabbi Jeffrey Ableser

He said his congregation and the Shaar Shomayim's schools were merged eight years ago to offset the drop in enrolment and now offer the community's youth an "integrated" education "from preschool through high school."

For the past year, the shuls have planned the upcoming gala with an eye toward pitching Windsor as an attractive alternative to bigger cities.

"We have more infrastructure than we need right now," Rabbi Ableser said. "We have a mortuary, a senior's home [and] an active chevra kadisha. We are all one community, even though we have a few congregations."

Beth El serves some 170 families, he said.

"I'd love people to move back to Windsor. One could make a case that life [here] is better," he said, alluding to the city's proximity to Detroit, with its four popular sports franchises, its varied selection of radio stations and the fact that "the prices of homes are 30 per cent cheaper here."

"I came back to Windsor from Toronto because it's a heimish community," he said.

Rabbi Ableser's first pulpit job was at Temple Sinai in Toronto.

Windsor's Jewish New Year Gala takes place Sept. 27 at the Windsor Jewish Community Centre and will feature kosher catering, live music, a comedian, a silent auction and dancing, among other activities. Tickets cost $75.

Dispute threatens Rabbi Nachman's Uman gravesite

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

After a Ukrainian government official tried to seize control of a major chassidic religious site four years ago, the Breslov World Center in Uman found itself in a costly land contract dispute.

The ongoing legal costs hamper the centre's ability to maintain the gravesite area of Rabbi Nachman of Breslov, the 18th-century founder of Breslover Chassidism.

"Ukraine being what Ukraine is, we spent four years in the courts," said Rabbi Maimon, who heads the Breslov World Center. He visited Toronto recently to raise funds to help pay ongoing legal fees and bring attention to the centre's fight.

Court expenses have reached about $750,000 (all figures US). "You can imagine how much this has set us back," Maimon said.

The legal problem began five years ago when the centre, in central Ukraine, had already built half of its new adjacent synagogue, meant to accommodate the growing number of foreign visitors to the gravesite.

To help comply with building standards, the centre hired a project developer from Uman, Igor Lifshitz. After eight months of construction preparations, the centre received building permits and came to an agreement with the municipality about the size

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND CAMPAIGN TO FIGHT CLIMATE CHANGE

JNF
JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF CANADA

The first and most important step in fighting climate change is reducing greenhouse gas emissions. Mindful of Jewish tradition that recognizes our responsibility for the Earth, Jewish National Fund of Canada announces JNF goneutral – An Environmental Movement for Tomorrow.

This exciting campaign will educate individuals and empower them to:
- Help offset their carbon dioxide contributions by planting trees
- Take an active role in JNF's cutting-edge environmental projects
- Make simple lifestyle changes to lessen their own environmental impact

As a global environmental leader with a century of experience, JNF is uniquely positioned to spearhead this campaign of environmental accountability. "JNF goneutral" makes each of us active participants in protecting our planet by reducing our own carbon emissions.

Trees absorb carbon dioxide while releasing oxygen into the air. Visitors to www.jnf.ca/goneutral can calculate their personal carbon footprint and then counter it by supporting afforestation programs in Israel. Since 1901, Jewish National Fund has helped capture about 110 million tons of carbon by planting more than 230 million trees and turning 250,000 acres of arid land into sustainable forests.

Combating the devastating impact of climate change is a crucial global effort. "goneutral" carries on JNF's leadership role in addressing difficult environmental challenges.

An official U.N.-recognized Non-Governmental Organization, JNF is the world's leader in water desalination and recycling, organizing international conferences on desertification and arid land management, while pursuing cutting-edge research in nanotechnology, alternative energies and afforestation benefiting all humanity.

Kids play ukulele for peace

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — If you thought the ukulele was mainly a Hawaiian phenomenon, think again.

The small, guitar-like instrument has enjoyed a small renaissance in Canada and Israel in recent years, and the Edmonton Ukulele Fest is a prime example.

According to organizer, Mark Hayes, the festival, which is hoped to become an annual event, began as a joke between friends and evolved into a fundraiser for Ukuleles for Peace, a non-profit group in Israel. The festival will be held Sept. 11 at 10081 Jasper Ave. featuring a selection of musicians that includes Doug Hoyer of Illfit Outfit, Alena Manera, and The Be Arthurs. Doors open at 8 p.m. and admission is by donation.

Paul Moore, 58, hadn't heard of the Edmonton Ukulele Fest until contacted by e-mail in early September. The founder of the five-year-old Ukuleles For Peace (UFP, on the web at www.ukulelesforpeace.com), the British-born Moore moved to Israel several years ago and spends his time growing apples and playing music with groups such as the Jerusalem Travelers and Organic Energy, and in solo acts.

He considered leaving Israel when the suicide bombings increased in frequency, but he changed his mind when he determined that the simple ukulele could be a tool to allow Jewish and Arab children to meet in a positive way.

So he volunteered to teach the ukulele in the Democratic School in Hod Hasharon, a Jewish town, and the El Najach school in nearby Tira, an Israeli Arab town, on a weekly basis, involving some 100 children. He also created the UFP orchestra, comprising 10 to 15 children from both schools who meet to practise and perform on community holidays in English, Arabic and Hebrew.

"Before the Ukuleles for Peace program was introduced, there were virtually no communal or social ties between the communities of Tira and Hod Hasharon," he notes on his website.

"Since the start of the program, however, contacts between the two have begun to develop on a number of levels. At the most fundamental level is the orchestra itself. The children and some parents meet to rehearse and travel to performances together. Here, the children in particular began to form friendships, which lead to birthday party invitations, playdates and other social outings. The orchestra has held several picnics at which families have begun to interact and get to know one another.

"The only reason I see hope is because I see the kids working together," Moore says. "The people in the middle ground have got to get out there and make peace happen. It ain't gonna happen if we sit by and say we're all peace-loving people – without talking to one another. It's about sharing in one another's happy moments and tragedies. You're fusing the communities."

Blog engages Jews from around the world

Recent posts have included a discussion on Rachel Papo, a U.S.-born Israeli photographer who took a series of photos of young women in the Israel Defence Forces. Another post discussed being engrossed by the prominent women of the U.S. Democratic party, such as Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton.

An additional catalyst for blogging came when Rabbi Landsberg began to appreciate the spectrum of Jewish experiences in her life, such as being one of two Jews in a small town in Denmark, and living in New York and Jerusalem.

"I became acutely aware of the polyphony of voices that makes the Jewish world, all the more so that my father-in-law is from Vienna, Austria, and my mother-in-law is from Abadan, Iran," says the 42-year-old.

Her goal of engaging Jews from around the world has been successful, she says – her blog is read as far away as Asia and Europe – and she also tries to engage and find illumination in Jews who have different beliefs from hers.

Two years ago, she began to participate in the Rabbinic Leadership Initiative at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, where she studied with a small group of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis.

"We sit in a room with no agreement except text and the dates of the chagim. And not all of those can we agree on. I came to realize that although I am an impassioned liberal Jew, I am doing my beliefs a disservice if I don't engage Jews whose identity is profoundly different than my own."

Jewish law society recognized by Montreal bar

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Lord Reading Law Society, which has represented the interests of Jewish lawyers in Montreal since its founding 60 years ago, has received the Medal of the Bar of Montreal.

The presentation took place at the Rentrée judiciaire, the annual ceremony marking the reopening of the courts after the summer recess, on Sept. 4 at the Montreal courthouse. Presided over by Quebec chief justice Michel Robert, this event traditionally draws a wide representation of the city's legal community and the province's justice officials.

Lawyer Ian Solloway, who headed the society's 60th anniversary celebrations, said it is very rare for the medal to be awarded to an association. For the nearly 1,000-member society, he said, it symbolizes the high regard the Jewish community enjoys today, in contrast to the pervasive anti-Semitism that prompted Jewish lawyers of the day to band together in 1948.

"This is a tremendous honour. Only two or three other times has the medal been presented to a group," Solloway said.

In a letter to the society, Stephen Schenke, bâtonnier of the Montreal bar, wrote: "The Lord Reading's passion for social justice, its tradition of legal excellence, its contribution to the judiciary and to the Montreal bar are just a few of the significant contributions that we wish to recognize.

"We also believe that by honouring the [society] we are recognizing the diversity of the Montreal bar. By highlighting your 60 years of success, we are sending a message of welcome to all ethnic groups in Montreal and cherishing values of pluralism that are so important for the future of Montreal and Quebec."

The catalyst for the founding of the society was an incident in 1948 when the Quebec bar unwittingly booked its annual convention at Mont Tremblant Lodge, which did not admit Jews, Solloway said. There is documentation showing that when the lodge owner, American millionaire Joe Ryan, was approached by the bar about this discriminatory policy, he replied that, it being fall – the off-season – there would likely not be many guests around who would object to a Jewish presence.

The bar's bâtonnier Gustave Monnette apologized to Jewish lawyers at a meeting convened at the Montefiore Club, but said it was too late to change the venue and urged Jews to attend anyway.

But they decided to boycott the convention, and soon after that, the Lord Reading was founded, named for Rufus Daniel Isaacs, the early 20th-century British lawyer who became a cabinet minister, ambassador and viceroy of India, earning the title of Marquess of Reading. It was a reminder perhaps of how far behind, not only Quebec, but Canada was in elevating Jews to high public office.

The early society's mandate was to lobby for fair representation of Jews on the bar and the bench. As a result of the Tremblant incident, the Montreal bar amended its constitution to ensure that at least one Jew would be on the bar's council at all times.

The society's first president, the late Benjamin Robinson, also became the first Jewish representative on that council.

Perhaps not coincidentally, one of the society's members, the late Harry Batshaw, in 1950, became the first Jew appointed to a superior court in Canada, when he was named to Quebec Superior Court.

A Lord Reading alumnus, Supreme Court of Canada justice Morris Fish, will be keynote speaker at an invitation-only gala dinner Sept. 18 at the Montefiore Club, which has been the society's base for more than 30 years. A special guest that night will be Stephen Greenwald, president of the American Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists.

Although discrimination is not an issue today, Solloway believes the society remains relevant. "We are not a 'dead poets' society,' as some people have suggested. We are more active than ever."

Lord Reading was the first association of its kind in Canada, and remains unique and independent, he said. "We are the collective voice of Jewish lawyers vis-à-vis the greater legal community and government."

One goal is to promote closer ties with the American and international associations of Jewish lawyers, he said.

As it was from the beginning, the society is a social group for Jewish lawyers and notaries (and a small number of non-Jews today), and provides a forum for continuing legal education. Over the years, some 350 speakers, many of them leading legal or political figures, have addressed the society. In 2002, when Solloway was president, Supreme Court chief justice Beverley McLachlin graced the speaker's podium. Currently, the society organizes five dinner lectures a year for members.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Women help women deal with halachic issue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For three days later this month, Dr. Deena Zimmerman will serve as scholar in residence at the Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton. An American olah living in Israel, Zimmerman will be in Western Canada to answer questions that women might be too embarrassed to ask their local rabbi.

Questions on marital relations, the female reproductive system, visits to the mikvah, infertility treatment and other sensitive topics are likely to be raised.

To address these issues, Zimmerman will rely on her knowledge of two distinct fields: medicine and halachah, Jewish religious law. As a "yoetzet halachah," or adviser on Jewish law, as well as a pediatrician and lactation consultant, she has the breadth of knowledge to help women make good medical choices that also conform to ritual law.

Dr. Deena Zimmerman

Zimmerman is a yoetzet graduate of Jerusalem's Nishmat Keren Ariel Program, where she was certified by a panel of Orthodox rabbis to serve as a resource for women regarding family purity issues.

While the halachic advice she dispenses could just as easily be related by a male, it is the "woman to woman" aspect of the process that has proven successful, Zimmerman said. "The questions deal with intimate topics and women feel more comfortable to talk to another woman and ask questions… Some women are not comfortable going to a rabbi to ask the questions."

Women dispensing halachic advice does sometimes "raise eyebrows in parts of the Orthodox community," Zimmerman acknowledged, "but women need to keep these halachot."

To do so they need advice. "Women have been advising other women on an informal basis for generations. Mothers have been passing on [information about] Jewish life to daughters for generations."

The women who are part of the program "can pass on halachah accurately and in depth," she added.

Zimmerman will present three lectures while in Edmonton. The first will describe the role of a yoetzet halachah, the second will examine women's role in the halachic process and the final one will focus on the mikvah.

Receiving advice from a woman knowledgeable in halachah has proven attractive to many women, particularly college-educated ones who "expect answers from other educated women," she said. "We ask sophisticated questions."

The questions generally fall into one of three categories: simple straightforward questions of halachah, such as how to prepare for a trip to the mikvah; medical questions; and an overlap of the two, such as the impact on marital relations when a woman is staining after taking hormonal treatments. A lot of the questions focus on the side effects of medical interventions, Zimmerman said.

All queries are kept in strict confidence and the advisers consult a rabbi when faced with questions that require a rabbinic ruling.

Candidates to the yoetzet halachah program devote two years to intensive study with rabbinic authorities on Jewish family law. They also attend weekly lectures presented by experts in a variety of fields, including gynecologists, marital therapists and infertility specialists, she said.

Nishmat, the Jerusalem Center for Advanced Torah Study for Women, graduated its first yoetzet halachah in 2000. Fifty others followed.

Most are based in Israel, but advisers also serve in Riverdale, N.Y., Silver Spring, Md., and northern New Jersey. A yoetzet halachah is expected to serve a number of Manhattan congregations beginning this fall.

One of Nishmat's primary resources is the Golda Koschitzky women's halachic hotline, which has received some 80,000 calls. Thirty per cent are in English, indicating the program's popularity in North America, Zimmerman said.

Zimmerman, who graduated from the Albert Einstein College of Medicine of Yeshiva University, was one of the first two yoetzet graduates. "I went into it to learn this area and as an opportunity to study. Soon after, I realized how much of a need there is for it."

Community to attend NY rally

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is mobilizing the Jewish community to attend a New York City rally on Sept. 22 against Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who is scheduled to speak that day at the United Nations.

The rally, to be held at noon alongside the UN at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, is being co-ordinated by a coalition that includes the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organization, UJA Federation of New York and the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York.

Ahmadinejad, whose country is said to be developing nuclear weapons, has repeatedly threatened to "wipe Israel off the map."

Those interested in attending the rally can contact Ilana Hirt at ihirt@ujafed.org or at 416-840-2987.

שעת נפש

נער ישראלי מאילת, שמגיל רך הולך לים עם גלשן הרוח שלו-מתחיל את האלימפיאדה בהישגים נהדרים, אבל לאחר מכן מתחיל לקרטע ונופל למקום הרביעי. ואז,,כשכולם אומרים "הנה עוד סיפור אכזבה ישראלי טיפוסי" הוא חוזר ומנצח.

הייתי באילת לפני פחות משנה, ומה אגיד לכם- אין מקום שמגיע לו יותר שמחה מאילת, ואין לי ספק שגולש הרוח צוברי יביא להם שמחה.

ושוב ושוב מוכח שישראל צריכה לעסוק בספורט שיש לה בו יתרון נדול-מאות קילומטרים של ים נהדר, שאפשר לשוט בו שנים עשר חדשים בשנה.

תברינו שמעון זר אביב עורך עיתון חדש שענה לשם שאי אפשר לטעות בו "טורונטו". נייר כרומו משובח, התייחסות מעמיקה לקהילה הישראלית שבהחלט יכולה לעשות שימוש בעוד עיתון. אני מאחל לשמעון ותבריו הצלחה מכל הלב. רק שזה יהיה קשה-עד כה הקהילה שלנו לא הצליחה לתמוך ביותר מעיתון אחד. ומדובר כמובן בתמיכה של קהל המפרסמים שאמור לשאת במחיר.

שאט נפש

בבית החולים של נהריה נפטרה תינוקת פנה. האו בזרועות אמה, שלקחה אותה לקבורה, היא התעוררה שוב. אין ספק-כישלון מחפיר של מי שאמור היה לקבוע את מותה. התנוקת הובהלה שוב לטיפול נמרץ ונפטרה. עד כאן-סיפור לא נעים שעלול לקרות בכל מקום בעולם. אבל הינה הקטע הישראלי:

בראיון לעיתונות אמרה האם:

"דקרו אותי בסכין פעמיים... היא מתה לי פעמיים, ובבית החולים אפילו לא התנצלו".

בישראל לא אוהבים לקחת אחריות, לא בגשר של המכביה, ולא במלחמת לבנון השניה, ולא בבית חולים בנהריה. "להתנצל"- המילה לא נפוצה בארץ הקודש.

וכאן מגיע מדוברנו "שאט נפש " לטורונטו, שבו חברת גאז פרוֹן שגרמה לפיצוץ אדיר לפני חודש עדיין לא הופיעה בציבור להתנצל או לפחות להביע את צערה על הנזק. גם החברה וגם עורך הדין שלה הם ישראלים. התנהגות שלומדים כנראה מהבית-לא לקבל אחריות. ורק לשם השוואה, חברת הבשר הענקית "מייפל לִיף" שויהום במפעל שלה גרם למגפת ליסטריה ולמותם של קשישים-מקימת מסיבת עיתונאים כל יום, ומנהלה התנצל ולקח אחריות מלאה. יותר מזה-כשניסו לטעון שזה כשלון של הגוף הממשלתי שאמור לבחון את הבשר, ענה המנהל: שלא תהיינה אי הבנות-הפשאלה היא שלנו ולא של הממשלה."

משיבון של סבתא ישראלית

היתה קטע ששלחה לי רותי וומר:

"הנעתם למשיבון של סבתא אמא. אני כרגע לא בבית.

אם אתה אחד מילדי- הקש 1

אם אתה צריך שאהיה ביבי סיטר-הקש 2

אם מכוניתך במוסך ואתה זקוק לאוטו שלי-הקש 3

אם התקשרת ביום ששי ולא הספקת לקנות חלה-הקש 4

אם עלי להסיע את הנכדים לבית הספר/מעון/חוג בלט-הקש 5

אם אתה אחד מחברי או חברותי-אל תשאירו הודעה כי לא נראה לי שאספיק לחזור אליכם השבוע."

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Election 2008

Security expected to be an issue in 2008 vote

The Jewish community can also expect a lot of rhetoric from the major political parties as the quest for the ethnic communities' vote ramps up.

As reported in The CJN over the last year, the Conservative government has been active in courting the Jewish community since coming to power in 2006: by making security funding available to Jewish organizations and supporting Israel at the United Nations, among other things. And Harper and outgoing Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert became friendly during last year's Annapolis, Md., peace summit.

In the spring, Dion passed through the Toronto area and spoke to the Jewish community at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill, pledging $75 million in funds to ethnic communities across Canada to help beef up their security if the Liberals are elected.

For its part, the Green party announced last week that it had removed one of its candidates, John Shavluk, because of anti-Semitic remarks he allegedly made on a website in 2006.

Shavluk had represented the party in British Columbia's Newton-North Delta riding until last week.

"Respect for diversity is a fundamental principle of the Green party," leader Elizabeth May said on the party's website. "We condemn anti-Semitism, and our members work to encourage respectful dialogue, diversity, peace and co-operation."

May said she "thanked" Shavluk for his prior work and informed him that his views were not "consistent" with those of the party.

"I will not sign his nomination papers, and the Green party will nominate another candidate," she said.

However, a Globe and Mail report on Sept. 6 said May is giving her support to Qais Ghanem, the Green candidate for Ottawa-South.

Ghanem, in an online discussion forum on the Green party website, has reportedly called on the party to adopt a resolution on "Palestine" in which it calls upon Israel to "end its forty-year [sic] occupation of all Arab lands without preconditions."

As for the New Democratic Party, in June, its foreign affairs critic, Paul Dewar, asked the Harper government to reconsider the decision to boycott the upcoming 2009 World Conference Against Racism – commonly referred to as Durban II – after initially standing with the Conservatives and the Liberals on the issue.

The Bloc Québécois also believes Canada should have a presence at the conference.

The first Durban conference in 2001 is widely acknowledged as having turned into a virulently anti-Semitic affair.

With a truncated election campaign – just 36 days long, the minimum allowable by law – and the vote on a yom tov, Jewish community organizations and leaders have said they will offer an array of guidelines and advice to help voters make informed decisions on the candidates and parties.

Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said his organization is urging Jews to find ways to vote despite the conflict with Sukkot.

"We will heavily publicize the many ways in which Jewish community members can vote for the candidate of their choice," he wrote in an e-mail to The CJN just prior to the election call.

"Not only are advance polls an option, but it is possible to vote during a federal election campaign, on any day, at an Elections Canada office. We will make that clear to our community. Our objective is to encourage community members to exercise their franchise through the many options available."

Sukkot vote called 'disappointing, insensitive'

Last week, B'nai Brith Canada said that it, too, had been in "ongoing" discussions with the prime minister and called the Sukkot election date "regrettable yet understandable," declaring that all parties and candidates should make the security of its citizens a "top issue" in the election campaign.

B'nai Brith issued the statement after a security scare involving El Al in Toronto on Sept. 3. (See related story on page 1.)

"In recent months, Israel's security establishment has repeatedly warned that North American Jewish communities are particularly vulnerable to potential terrorist threats, notably by Hezbollah – a terrorist group with a known presence in this country," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Last Friday, the Conservatives addressed this issue by pledging more money to the Jewish community via the government's $3-million Security Infrastructure Program.

Launched in July 2007 to help ethnic communities at risk of hate crimes beef up security at their places of worship, schools and other areas, the announcement promised another $392,735 to Toronto-area Jewish organizations in its second round of funding, including $100,000 to Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, $39,595 to Bialik Hebrew Day School of Toronto, $62,183 to B'nai Brith Canada, $95,000 to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, $16,977 to Chabad at Flamingo in Thornhill and a combined $53,280 to two Eitz Chaim School campuses in Toronto.

Six Montreal Jewish community organizations also received more than $144,000 to help defray their security costs: Federation CJA for its Cummings House headquarters ($50,535), Congregation Beth Ora in St. Laurent ($27,100), the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Snowdon ($23,274), Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron in Côte St. Luc ($16,466), Beth Zion Congregation, also in Côte St. Luc ($15,568), and the YM-YWHA Jewish Community Centre's West Island branch in Pierrefonds ($11,540).

CJC applauded the funding announcement, with Farber calling it "a very good beginning," but cautioning that there was "still much work to be done."

'CJPAC is planning to focus on a specific advance voting day for the community'

If the Conservatives are not re-elected, the new government will have to decide whether to continue the security program.

Another organization that will speak to Jewish voters in this campaign will be the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

In the past, the grassroots, non-partisan group – whose mandate is to "engage the community in the political process" – has helped convene candidate debates on both provincial and federal levels and will be fully involved in encouraging Jewish Canadians to vote and participate again this year, said Josh Cooper, CJPAC's executive director.

Cooper said that while the Sukkot scenario does present a challenge, it's no reason for Jews to abandon political activism in Canada this election.

"CJPAC is planning to focus on a specific advance voting day for the community. Working with all campaigns in electoral districts with large Jewish constituencies, we want to ensure the community votes in large numbers," he said. "While the community will be able to ensure our voice is heard at the ballot box, the larger problem exists that many of us will not be able to volunteer on election day. This is also an issue for Jewish candidates. However, members of the community can still volunteer for the candidate of their choice throughout the election period, as well as take a lawn sign."

One politician not content with the government's election call is Toronto Liberal Joe Volpe, MP for Eglinton-Lawrence.

In a statement to The CJN, Volpe called the Sukkot election date "disappointing" and "insensitive" and cited Harper's decision as a "complete lack of judgment and consideration" with regard to Jewish constituents.

A Sept. 7 Ekos poll showed the Conservatives leading in popular support on the eve of the election campaign, citing the national federal vote intention among decided voters as Conservatives with 37 per cent, Liberals 24 per cent, NDP 19 per cent, Green party 10 per cent, and Bloc Québécois six per cent.

The poll also showed the Conservatives having a leadership edge, with Harper seen as "best prime minister" with 32 per cent support, followed by NDP Leader Jack Layton at 19 per cent and Dion a distant third with 12 per cent.

Not enough done to defend Israel on campus: ambassador

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Departing Israeli ambassador Alan Baker chastised the organized Canadian Jewish community for not doing more to counter anti-Israel activity on university campuses.

In remarks at an Aug. 27 Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) event, where he received the CIJR's Lion of Judah award, Baker said Jewish students and academics need more money and moral support to effectively defend Israel against "a very well-organized and well-financed propaganda campaign."

He suggested that the Jewish establishment is out of touch with what is going on at Canadian universities. "How many Jewish leaders have been on campus in the last 20 years and taken part in debates?… Every Jewish leader should be obliged to go speak on campus and give support to the students."

Such action might be preferable to "organizing dinners and galas to raise money for Israel and Jewish institutions," he said.

"It's a question of priorities, and the campuses must come first."

Alan Baker

During his four years in Canada, Baker said he tried to speak at nearly every university in the country, sometimes against the advice of the organized Jewish community, which he said "does not want to stir up any problems."

Israel is being attacked not only by Arab and left-wing groups, but also by Jews themselves, he said. "Every time I am on campus, the most embarrassing and disgusting questions are from Jews."

Baker had high praise for CIJR, which publishes, mostly online, articles from a variety of sources related to the Middle East and Jewish affairs, and it also runs programs training students in Israel advocacy.

He chided the organized Jewish community for not giving CIJR the support it deserves. The 20-year-old independent foundation relies almost solely on donations from individuals.

"CIJR is possibly one of the most serious organizations functioning in Canada, doing important work to inform the public and those working on behalf of Israel, giving them the tools they need, especially on campus… It's one of the few organizations tackling [the campus situation] head on, and should have wider community support."

Baker said: "Canadians should be able to speak out on campus with confidence and knowledge, and without fear. It is difficult to understand why the organized Jewish community does not have the good judgment to see how this organization is working in the field."

The materials that the CIJR disseminates are also useful to Israel's envoys, he said.

"I'm somewhat embarrassed to say even our own foreign affairs information, or hasbarah, department does not always get us material in real time to answer the questions," Baker said.

Baker receives CIJR award

There was more blunt talk from the event's other two honorees, investment advisor and National Post and Toronto Sun current affairs columnist Theo Caldwell and former World Jewish Congress vice-president and Australian Jewish leader Isi Leibler and his wife, Naomi, world president of Emunah, a religious Zionist women's organization.

Caldwell, a non-Jew honoured for his vigorous defence of Israel, and Isi Leibler disagreed over which Christians are the true friends of Israel.

Caldwell, who identified himself as a Presbyterian, maintained that all practising Christians, not only fundamentalists, are the best friends that Israel has because of their understanding and appreciation of the fact their faith emerged from Judaism.

Liebler, however, thinks only evangelical Christians can be counted on as friends, and that they are, in fact, the Jewish state's "only allies today" and are critical to Israel's well-being.

"Some Christians are great. Some are our worst enemies," he added.

Among the latter he included the Presbyterian church, which he described as "quite horrific," and the Anglicans – among whom Caldwell's brother, who was present, is counted – whom he said are not much better.

Even worse, according to Leibler, are the secular liberals.

"If anyone had told me 10 years ago that I would have friendships with evangelical Christians and feel comfortable with them, I never would have believed it. You can talk with them about good and evil. You can't do that with liberals. Everything is relative to them," said Leibler, who now lives in Jerusalem, where he chairs the Israel-Diaspora Committee of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs.

Leibler said Jews should welcome the prayers that these Christians say for Israel.

CIJR founder and director Frederick Krantz added that he also welcomes liaisons with evangelical Christians and is not concerned that their theology may entail the ultimate conversion of Jews. "I say, 'Fine. When the messiah comes, we'll ask him if he has been here before.'"

Elsewhere, Liebler decried the absence of able leadership in Israel today, but said he is confident that the recent corruption scandals will pave the way for the emergence of "good Jews" as leaders.

The indictment of the president, prime minister and some cabinet ministers has shown that those in high office aren't immune to justice and will ensure that future politicians are "as clean as a whistle."

He added: "Despite its sleazy politicians, Israel is still the miracle of the 20th century, and Jews should feel an enormous pride in its achievements… It is still the superpower of the Middle East, and I would not have brought my children and grandchildren to Israel if I did not have the conviction it will overcome its problems."

Liebler also gave CIJR a ringing endorsement, and called it a "scandal" that CIJR must struggle to raise a relatively modest annual budget of $250,000 in a Jewish community of such wealth.

"That's peanuts when put into context," he said.

Threat to gravesite

of the new complex, according to Rabbi Maimon.

A few days later, however, the centre received what turned out to be a surprise contractual agreement from a local member of Parliament, Pytor Pavlovich Guzmenko.

Signed by Lifshitz, who Rabbi Maimon alleges misused his power of attorney, the contract obligated the centre to pay $5 million to complete the structure, which Rabbi Maimon said was twice the cost originally estimated by all parties. The first of the deposits was due 10 days later.

"It [the contract] had a number of draconian clauses," Rabbi Maimon said. One, he said, included a 50 per cent penalty fee in the event the centre does not finish its construction and late payment fees of $135,000 a month. The centre feared that Guzmenko's move to place a court-ordered lien on the grave and nearby synagogue would result in the site's being shut down, or built over.

The centre has since lost the case in the economic court, and an appeal was made to the Supreme Court.

A representative of the Breslov World Center has contacted Guzmenko, who has postponed the Supreme Court appeal, and negotiated a written agreement to try to resolve the dispute out of court. Since May, the centre has been waiting to finalize the arrangement.

The mounting legal fees have had a direct impact on the centre's abilities to accommodate foreigners and to maintain the Uman Jewish sites. The centre pays $1 million annually for security, water, electricity, gas and sanitation. Twenty-thousand tourists visit on Rosh Hashanah, and 130,000 people visit at other times of the year.

Chassidic couple invites whole town to wedding

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

STE. AGATHE DES MONTS — It was a storybook setting for a wedding: the edge of Lac des Sables in Ste. Agathe des Monts, as the sun set behind the hills on a warm late summer evening.

Getting married lakeside had been the dream of the bride ever since she left her Paris home to study in this Laurentian town nine years ago at age 17.

But this is more than a love story. The bride, Hana Sellem, and groom, Moshe Barouk, are Lubavitchers and the Sept. 2 wedding was a traditional chassidic simchah. Not only was it outdoors, but the couple invited the public at large to attend the ceremony.

Some 300 people, about evenly divided between Jews and non-Jews, turned out, including municipal officials and the local police chief of this town of about 10,000.

The venue was Lagny Park in the heart of town. A pre-reception gathering was held in the small pavilion on site, offered to the couple free of charge by the town. The building is ordinarily not rented out for private affairs, but Sellem and the town agreed to list the wedding as a cultural event open to all.

The open-air wedding, which was planned months ago, took on greater significance coming just a couple of weeks after the headline-making punching in the face of a Jewish man, Mendy Haouzi of Montreal, 23, as he walked to the House of Israel synagogue on Shabbat.

The incident has raised concerns that anti-Semitism is a resurgent problem in the area, which has a large, mainly part-time, Jewish population with a history going back more than a century.

For Sellem, sharing her big day with everyone was her way of showing appreciation for a townsfolk among whom, she has made many friends, both Jewish and non-Jewish. She first came to Ste. Agathe when the Bais Moshe Chaim Teachers' Seminary was opened there by Chanie Carlebach, rebbetzin of the House of Israel.

After graduating, Sellem became a vice-principal of the school, which now has 35 students from various countries.

"When the [assault] happened, I felt sad," she said, "but I love it here and have wonderful neighbours, and feel very comfortable. I wanted to show that there are a lot of positive things here, that everyone can learn from each other, and that we have more in common than differences."

For Chanie and Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, they hoped the occasion would go some way in conveying the community's wish to live in harmony with their neighbours, which it has, in fact, done, despite a spate of worrisome incidents recently.

"Out of something ugly, something beautiful has come," said the rabbi, who has been spiritual leader for 23 years, succeeding his late father. It's the first time to his knowledge that a chupah had ever been set up in a public place in Ste. Agathe.

"We wanted to share with the entire community the wondrous ways of HaShem."

His wife echoed those thoughts. "We are all one people under one God. We are saying we are all here for each other."

D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, who has a home in Ste. Agathe, said the event is in the spirit of the recommendation of the recent Bouchard-Taylor Commission that the province's majority and minorities should interact more to understand each other's culture better.

Frema Shatner, who lives year-round in Morin Heights, said she wouldn't have missed the wedding for anything. "I've never had a problem, but you read about attacks, and you wonder if anti-Semitism is starting again. It's positive to see so many French Canadians come out."

Nicole Meloche, representing the town, thanked the families for their "very generous gesture. We are honoured to have you here."

The female students, in their modest attire, have become a familiar sight in the town, and Sellem, with her outgoing personality and French mother tongue, was especially well known, sometimes speaking in schools about Judaism.

The wedding was also a farewell: Barouk is from Florida, and that's where the couple will live.

Those gathered – who came as they were, in contrast to the black suits and formal gowns of the closer guests – watched in awe as Moshe was brought to the chupah by a procession of men carrying lanterns, as music played. After the blowing of the shofar, Hana, whose face was completely concealed, followed with a group of women guiding her, to spontaneous applause.

Rabbi Carlebach co-officiated with Rabbi Mordechai Lichy, Moshe's rabbi in Coral Springs, Fla., who struck a recognizable note when he observed, "Men are from Mars, and women from Venus."

A half-dozen other rabbis were also under the chupah, including the bride's father from France.

The proceedings were trilingual, with the rabbis explaining the proceedings in English and French, such as why the bride circles the groom seven times, the reading of the ketubah, the Sheva Brachot and the breaking of the glass.

French-language booklets explaining the rites in detail and containing a thank you from the couple and the bride's parents were also distributed.

"I've been in Ste. Agathe for 60 years, and never in my wildest imagination did I ever think I would see a night like this," Hy Rissman said.

The non-Jews present, mainly francophones, were "polite, inquisitive and so understanding," he added.

Hélène and André Gauthier, a middle-aged couple, agreed they had learned a lot by attending. Neither had been to a Jewish wedding before and were curious.

against visiting remote areas or meeting people unfamiliar to them.

Kutner said El Al had "become more sensitive" to security concerns following that warning.

Meanwhile, in June, ABC News reported Hezbollah was planning to attack Jewish and Israeli targets in Canada.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the Jewish community has been on a heightened state of alert since the February 2008 assassination in Damascus of Imad Mughniyah, one of Hezbollah's top leaders.

Bernie Farber

Hezbollah immediately blamed Israel's Mossad for the operation, though Israel denied responsibility. Hezbollah subsequently promised to avenge the attack.

Farber said he had been in contact with the security and intelligence unit of the Toronto Police Service and had been told there was no evidence that surveillance of El Al crews had been undertaken.

The police service, which liaises with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) and Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), also had no information about arrests of a Hezbollah cell as was reported in Israel.

"Once again, it has whetted the attention of people, similar to the [story that] Hezbollah planned an attack in Canada against Jewish targets," he said.

At the time of the June ABC News report, Melisa Leclerc, a spokesperson for Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day, acknowledged that "Canada is not immune from the threat of terrorism.

"As you can appreciate, the minister cannot comment on operations that Canada's security agencies may or may not be undertaking," Leclerc said.

"The government of Canada remains vigilant in our efforts to prevent a terrorist act both at home and abroad."

Though Farber discounted the most recent story of a potential attack, he acknowledged such an attack "is quite possible. That's why we have to be on guard."

The community elevates its security measures in advance of the High Holidays. "That's the time we ramp up our security strategy anyway," he said.

"In this day and age, with the Internet, cellphone chatter and concern over terrorism worldwide, from time to time these reports come up. We should always be concerned, but I'm not sure we should raise four red flags over it. Two are fine," he said.

This is not the first time El Al's Canadian operations were reportedly threatened. In September 2003, a flight from Tel Aviv to Los Angeles, with a stopover in Toronto, was rerouted to Montreal's Mirabel Airport and then to Hamilton because of a terrorist threat.

Then-transport minister David Collenette said, "We had information there was a specific threat against this El Al flight, and therefore we ordered the pilot to immediately land at Mirabel.

"The threat was at Pearson airport, and that is why the flight was asked to land at Mirabel."

El Al's general manager at the time, Stanley Morais, said despite intelligence warnings to the government of Canada, the flight could have landed safely in Toronto.

In other international incidents, two people were killed in July 2002 when a gunman opened fire on El Al passengers at Los Angeles International Airport.

Seven Dutch youths were arrested for planning to attack an El Al plane in 2005, and in June 2006, the general prosecutor's office in Bonn, Germany, confirmed that Swiss authorities had unearthed a plot by a Muslim terror cell to attack an El Al plane.

In November 2006, the German government arrested six Muslims on suspicion of planning to blow up an El Al plane after takeoff from Frankfurt.

Up and coming indie band sticking to its roots

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

When you think of rock 'n' roll and rock stars, the first thought that comes to mind generally isn't Thornhill, Ont., suburbanites jamming in their parents' basements.

But the self-proclaimed indie band The Cunninghams are four twentysomething Thornhill boys who rehearse in their parents' basements and find the area conducive to music-making.

Dubbed "the first family of rock 'n' roll," the quartet's persona isn't typical of most Canadian bands. Rather, it resonates around each member's alter ego in The Cunninghams family. Band mates answer to stage names that reflect the band's attitude on stage and their satirical perceptions of rock stars.

"We feel our music omits a pretentious calibre, and when we dress on stage we have uniforms that convey that message," says guitarist Justin Abrams, aka Nigel Cunningham.

"It's all about prestige and we really want to focus on the marketing and branding [of our band], and being attuned to how our music is performed and how we want to be perceived," adds bassist Zack Weinberg, or Clapsbury Cunningham. "We're classy dudes and our [real] names didn't exemplify that prestige, and [our stage names] are way more fun and classy."

Nigel and Clapsbury, along with guitarist Mike Levine, aka Pierce Cunningham, and drummer Mike Almos, aka Reginald (Reggy) Cunningham, collaborated a year ago.

Founding band members Nigel and Pierce, who'd been making music together since 2002, transformed their duo into a foursome after inviting their former high school classmates to a jam session.

The Cunninghams opened for Sam Roberts at the Opera House in Toronto last April after winning the Mazda Muzic Tour Contest.

Nigel and Pierce were looking to produce a new sound with a stronger rhythm section, and the creative vigour that Reggy and Clapsbury brought solidified the group that became The Cunninghams.

"We're a tight-knit community in Thornhill, and we came together and it formed from there. There's nothing else to do in Thornhill but play music," says Pierce. "We recorded our first song, Black and White, in a $10,000 studio but we kept to the basics, and sticking to our roots helps a lot with the creative energy between us. When we're in Thornhill, it's a comfortable feeling because we know the area and for us, it's conducive to making music."

The band members book their own tour dates and lug their equipment from one show to the next and, like all indie bands, each member sacrifices personal time to make music their top priority.

"We definitely make a lot of sacrifices in our personal lives. We all work full-time jobs, and we only have so many hours in the day to do whatever we do in our personal time," says Clapsbury. "It's a big time commitment, but it pays off in the end."

The never-ending dedication is quickly paying off for a band that only recently launched itself into the abyss of Canadian indie bands.

This past April, The Cunninghams won the Mazda Muzic Tour Contest, an online voting contest in which more than 400 Canadian bands competed to win the opening gig for Sam Roberts at the Opera House in Toronto.

"It was really cool looking out into the Opera House crowd, because I'd been a part of the crowd before as an audience member," Clapsbury recalls.

"For me, this competition was about hard work paying off, and it was about us working hard and seeing results."

Pierce added that looking out into a sea of people was surreal, but they were able to maintain their composure.

"No matter the concert we perform – whether it's for 800 or 10 people – we deliver to the max and give 100 per cent."

The band's live performance is much like its recorded sound in the sense that it's consistent and raw. Band members wear identical stage outfits, a rarity among current bands, especially in the Toronto music scene.

The Cunninghams are heavily influenced by the British bands Oasis, the Beatles and Pink Floyd, and the band's decision to wear identical blazers, button-down dress shirts and skinny ties reflect a British rock-star image.

The group's look and stage presence makes it easy for the audience to focus on its likable sound, which has gotten the band this far.

"When you look out at a crowd and see someone singing along... it's a cool feeling that people are listening to what you created and enjoying it," says Pierce. "We all love the attention of people looking at us."

Up next for "the family of rock 'n' roll" is a tour across southern Ontario, visiting university towns including London, Kingston and Waterloo before they head northeast to Ottawa, and Montreal.

The Cunninghams released their debut EP, That Oughtta Hold 'em, last month.

For more information on The Cunninghams, visit www.thecunninghamsband.com.

AEPi Ottawa gets award for Israel advocacy

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA— The Ottawa chapter of the international Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) was recognized at the organization's national convention last month for its efforts in Israel advocacy.

The chapter, known as the Nu Kappa chapter, created a pro-Israel exhibit last April that it set up in the atrium of Carleton University's University Centre. The display showed how Israel is using its security fence along its border with the West Bank.

The exhibit was a response to a number of Israel Apartheid Week events that took place at various campuses in Canada, particularly at McMaster University and the University of Toronto.

Although Israel Apartheid Week events weren't held at Carleton, it did have a Muslim Awareness Week, during which the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was discussed.

"It was a chance for [Jewish] students to have their say after the apartheid week," AEPi Ottawa president Jon Telch said of his chapter's pro-Israel exhibit. "The display was providing information about why Israel needs to defend itself in such a way from acts of terrorism."

Telch said that although there was some negative feedback from students, which he had expected, there was also a lot of positive feedback.

He said he hoped that students would learn from the display and continue to educate themselves about the various perspectives on the conflict.

"[The goal was] that people will go home and do their research and make sure that they know that there are two sides to every story," he said.

For the exhibit, AEPi International awarded the Nu Kappa chapter with the Philip H. And Susan Cohen Award for Jewish Communal Service.

Andrew Borans, executive director of AEPi International, said the Ottawa branch was recognized within the 140-chapter international fraternity for running a Jewish event for both students and the community at large.

"When a group wins, it's often for a combination of Jewish events. Some are religious, some are cultural, some are social," said Borans.

This is the first award the chapter has received since it started up in 2001.

"It was a big step for us, because we hadn't had that international recognition in such a way before," Telch said.

"It was nice to know that not only does your hard work get rewarded, but that people appreciate that sometimes stances are hard to take, and when you decide that you're going to volunteer to do such things, there are people there to support you."

FAMILY MOMENTS

Mazel Tov

The Canadian Jewish news

It is with the utmost of joy and excitement that Mr. Jackson Eidelberg and Mr. Kelly MacGregor, of the City of Toronto, partners of 21 years, proudly announce the adoption of their beloved 11-year-old son Jacob Eidelberg MacGregor. This miracle occurred on August 25, 2008 in Family Court in the City of Toronto after a wait of 18 months for finalization.

Jacob is now an adored grandson of Mrs. Nusia Eidelberg of Toronto (pictured), nephew of Dr. Daune MacGregor, Ms Mary Lou MacGregor and Mr. John Rodger all of Toronto, Ontario; Mr. and Mrs. Steve and Dru Ball of Winnipeg, Manitoba; Mr. Steve Eidelberg and Ms Lois Bain of Toronto, Ontario; and Mr. and Mrs. Jerzy and Ola Wencki of Gliwice, Poland; newly celebrated cousin to Filip Wencki of Warsaw, Poland; Dru MacGregor of Chatsworth, Ontario; Duncan and Caitlin Rodger of Toronto; Matthew and Joshua Eidelberg of Toronto; and Andrew Ball of Winnipeg; and worshipped by his canine brother and sister, Jakie and Lola (pictured).

Jacob is also very blessed to consolidate his new life with 12 year-old Philip of Kingsville, Ontario and 10-year old Sandi of Aylmer, Ontario, his brother and sister by birth; and Paul and Julie Bogart and John and Julie Vanderkooy, and their children, his beloved foster families. Thanks go to our much loved adoption practitioner, Betty Ann Streeter of Toronto and the Children's Aid Society.

Mazel tov Harold & Molly Silverstein on your 60th anniversary, Sept 12. Love from your children, grandchildren, family and friends.

Mazel tov to Dr. Rebecca Cash, David Altshuller and big sister Maya on the birth of Ezra Benjamin, born June 23.
